The Role of social policy in economic restructuring

by F. Wien. Halifax : Institute for Research on Public Policy, 1991. xv, 134 p. Bibliogr. ISBN 0 88645-140X
MICROLOG 92-03417 2 fiche

This study examines the changing economic base for social policy in advanced industrial countries, especially Canada and the United States, and the implications of these changes for social policy. It outlines three major forces that are reshaping the economy, and their interrelationship: an increase in international competition and the increasingly global nature of such competition; the changing nature of markets for goods and services, including their fragmentation, their uncertainty, the renewed emphasis on quality, and the shorter life cycle of products; and the continuing growth of science and technology. It also discusses the changing process of social policy formation in the new economic environment, and the prospects for social policy change in the 1990s.

Beetles (liquid conductivity detection devices) were installed in nuclear generating stations upstream of the rotameters used to feed gas to the individual strings of the annulus gas system (AGS). In the event of a leak and a high dew point alarm, the operating procedure calls for shut down of the compressors and the gas flow stops; it is expected that liquid water would flow past the ball float of the rotameter in a direction opposite to the gas flow during normal recirculation with the compressors on. This report presents the results of a limited number of tests on the rate at which the water backflows under a variety of conditions.

Le premier groupe, intitulé 'La dimension économique du renouveau constitutionnel', repose sur l'hypothèse du fédéralisme renouvelé, et il est organisé autour de thèmes économiques. Il considère les buts économiques que les Canadiens se sont fixés, aussi bien que les moyens de les atteindre et l'influence de différentes structures constitutionnelles. Le second groupe d'études, intitulé 'Rupture', considère les conséquences économiques de l'indépendance du Québec, aussi bien pour le Québec que pour le reste du Canada. Chacune des études de ce groupe comporte, lorsque indiqué, un résumé de l'analyse pertinente de la Commission Bélanger-Campeau, des contributions d'experts à travers le Canada, ainsi que des critiques et répliques plus brèves.

Sainfoin is a perennial forage legume grown in parts of Europe and Asia for hundreds of years. Various strains and accessions have been introduced to North America since about 1900, with most of the early introductions originating in western Europe. They adapted poorly and were low yielding in North American conditions. Recent introductions from the USSR and Turkey show greater promise, and more farmers are growing the crop since the release of improved cultivars in Canada and the United States. This publication describes the plant's characteristics, its adaptation to conditions in Canada, the cultivars available, inoculation and fertilizer requirements, seeding, weed control, usage and management, seed production, and diseases and insects.

This paper presents three different methods (telephone directory method, random digit dialling, and random telephone numbers using banks from directories) of selecting random telephone numbers for telephone surveys, using relatively simple computer programs. The design of the computer programs for this purpose is discussed and sample outputs from three computer programs, which can be run from an IBM PC, are given.

Sampling requirements for estimating the bycatch of Pacific halibut Hippoglossus stenolepis in the on-bottom trawl fishery in Hecate Strait

by J. Fargo, R.D. Stanley and C.M. Hand. Nanaimo, B.C. : Dept. of Fisheries and Oceans, Biological Sciences Branch, Pacific Biological Station, 1991. iv, 13 p. : ill. Bibliogr. (Canadian manuscript report of fisheries and aquatic sciences ; no. 2135) ISSN 0706-6473

This report investigates the precision of the bycatch estimate for halibut in the mixed species trawl fishery in Hecate Strait, derived from stratified mean CPUE. Using data collected from a 1981-82 observer program, mean CPUE was estimated for halibut, along with its variance for three areas of differing halibut habitat and density. From these estimates, the relationship between precision of the estimate of the stratified mean CPUE and sample size (number of tows observed) was derived.

Un logement décent et sûr est considéré comme un facteur essentiel de santé et de développement, tant sur le plan humain que sur le plan social. En 1986, un an avant l'Année internationale du logement des sans-abri proclamée par les Nations Unies, on estimait que plus d'un milliard d'habitants de la planète n'étaient pas logés de façon satisfaisante et que 100 millions d'entre eux habitaient des taudis ou étaient sans abri. La même année, entre 130 000 et 250 000 Canadiens étaient mal logés ou n'avaient pas de toit. Ce bulletin d'actualité se penche sur la question des sans-abri au Canada.

In March 1982, two experiments using a synthetic aperture radar (SAR) were conducted over a drilling platform near Sable Island, Nova Scotia to learn something about the sensitivities of the SAR to detecting surface gravity waves from a variety of radar orientations and in different wave conditions. The experiments occurred over two separate days with differing wave conditions. This report presents the results for the sensitivity of the radar to antenna wobble, changing incidence angle, and the detection of the same waves at differing radar orientations.

By the summer and fall of 1990, a decline in the shipping of crude oil through interprovincial Pipe Line Co.'s Montreal-Sarnia pipeline had led to interprovincial contracting the National Energy Board, industry, and governments on the procedures for deactivation. The declaration of war in the Persian Gulf in January 1991 led the federal government to ask the NEB to review the prospects for, and implications of, the closure of the Sarnia-Montreal pipeline and the options available for maintaining the line in an operating mode. As part of its review, the NEB invited written submissions from interested parties. Follow-up meetings with a number of respondents were held in Calgary and Ottawa when clarification of issues raised was deemed necessary. This report gives a brief background covering the history and recent events of the pipeline; discusses the major factors affecting eastern refiners' options for obtaining crude oil, namely, the supply and demand of domestic crude oil and changing

North American crude oil price patterns; and gives the NEB's comments on security of supply, impacts on markets and prices, options for continued west to east flow, pipeline engineering and environmental considerations, and regulatory processes.

This report develops a strategy for assessing the harm one satellite can do to another through the identification of 29 modes of possible harm whose characteristics and parameters are explained. A detailed verification strategy for each of these harm modes is developed. Peaceful space operations for the next 20 years are surveyed and possible ambiguities noted, with confidence-building measures evaluated. The idea of 'keep-out zones' is explored and traditional ideas for such zones are shown to be simplistic and unworkable. A new, 'free space' keep-out zone is proposed.

In October 1990, a 32,400 dollar savings by design program incentive was awarded to a rural public primary school for installation of a ground coupled heat pump system in the expanded building. A simulation was performed by LoadShaper, a technical software package, comparing the energy consumption of the heat pump to that of a base-case resistance-heated building. Field monitoring was then conducted during the 1991 winter-spring season. This study was performed to determine the actual peak demand savings available in operation in comparison with the predicted savings.

Production of heavy oil is difficult because of high oil viscosities and resultant low oil mobilities, resulting in only 2-10 percent of the oil in place being produced by primary depletion. Thermal methods appear to be economically marginal for reservoirs thinner than 10m, therefore the possibility of waterflooding heavy oil reservoirs was investigated. This report presents the results of a study aimed at scaled model investigation of waterflooding heavy oil reservoirs using horizontal wells with or without a bottom-water zone, and theoretical investigation of the same, to identify different production mechanisms, set screening criteria for target reservoir selection, and develop production strategies.

An extensive study into the state of science education at the Peel board, comprising student and teacher surveys, principal, resource teacher, and superintendent interviews and surveys; and a review of examinations and written curricula. While most students liked maths and sciences, they felt that their marks were only average compared to their other marks. The majority of students agreed that science was important and enjoyable, but most did not feel that it was important for getting a good job. Peel board-level curricula followed ministry policy closely. Quantity and quality of school plans were low for the elementary years; however, they were more complete at the secondary level.

Scotia-Fundy Region processing sector overview

Canada. Dept. of Fisheries and Oceans. Scotia-Fundy Region. Program Coordination and Economics Branch. Halifax : Fisheries and Oceans, Atlantic Fisheries Adjustment Program, 1991. 20, 20 p. : ill. Bilingual (Survol du secteur de la transformation...). CSI 21105.243. ISSN 1183-9635. ISBN 0-662-19098-X. MICROLOG 92-02634 1 fiche

The processing sector is a major component of the Scotia-Fundy fishing industry, doubling the annual 400-500m dollar value of the catch and providing employment for more than 12,000 plant workers. This overview of the sector summarizes production results from 1985-89, with updates to 1990 as data permits. It includes a review of raw material supplies, product forms, production, and price trends in nine major species categories, representing approximately 90 percent of the total volume of all species landed in the region. Data used is provided annually by fish processing plants to Fisheries and Oceans Canada and price trends are based on average annual FOB plant selling prices, taking inflation into account.

Scrap tire management in Ontario

Ontario. Waste Management Branch. Toronto : The Branch, 1991. xv, 164 p. : ill. Bibliogr. ISBN 0-7729-7830-1. MICROLOG 92-02863 2 fiche

Every year 7-8 million scrap passenger car and truck tires are generated in Ontario, with 60 percent ending up in landfills and 10 percent in tire piles. Fewer than 700,000 tires each year are recycled by processing them into raw materials for other products. This study identified policy options that will promote reduction, re-use, and recycling in scrap tire management. Topics covered include current scrap tire management practices in Ontario, processing technologies to recycle tires into other products, scrap tire management programs and practices in other jurisdictions, and an analysis of policy options to achieve the objective.

Screening durum wheat and wild emmer wheat germplasm for drought tolerance : technical/final report

Regina : Saskatchewan Agriculture Development Fund, 1992. 41 p. : ill. Bibliogr. ISSN 0829-9455. MICROLOG 92-06531 1 fiche

The genetic improvement of drought resistance capacity of crop varieties is the only long-term solution to the recurrent drought conditions in Saskatchewan. An integrated approach was adopted to identify genetic sources of drought resistance in wheat, concentrating on durum wheat and its immediate wild relative, wild emmer wheat from West Asia, since most of its growth is in the drought-prone areas. About 5,000 durum and 1,200 wild emmer wheat accessions from diverse origins were evaluated for 28 characters including response to field drought conditions. This report describes the project and the methods involved.

Screening for phytopath resistance in cereal and pulse crops for high moisture environs of Saskatchewan, including production systems : final report

Results of a project to establish an intensive irrigated field disease screening system at the University of Saskatchewan to allow plant breeders to incorporate tolerance or resistance to several critical diseases into new crop varieties designed for highly productive, high moisture, disease prone regions of Saskatchewan. Diseases of concern included stem and leaf rust of wheat and barley; septoria in wheat and barley; net blotch, spot blotch and scald of barley; tan spot in wheat; and ascochyta of pulses. In the first year of the project (1986), an automated, intensive irrigation system was developed, set up, and operated to provide frequent low intensity water capability for the creation of an ideal environment for disease inoculation, infection, and spread. In the second and succeeding years (1987-89), actual disease screening was begun for resistance to the various diseases.

Since 1978, Parks Canada has been working with the provinces and territories towards a Canadian Heritage Rivers System (CHRS) to give national recognition to the important rivers of Canada and ensure their future management. Between May 1985 and March 1986, a background study was carried out by Manitoba Natural Resources and Parks Canada to determine if the Seal River in northern Manitoba merited designation. The study consisted of an inventory of the heritage resources and an evaluation of these resources against CHRS guidelines. This report gives a general overview of the study area; identifies, describes and assesses its heritage resources; and evaluates its values for the natural and human heritage, as a recreational resource, its integrity, and its management suitability.

Totally-enclosed motor-propelled survival crafts (TEMPSC) are used to evaluate the crews of mobile offshore drilling units in emergencies. The small size and flat bottom of the TEMPSC pre-dispose most occupants to seasickness, even in relatively calm waters. This paper discusses efforts to improve the well-being of occupants by reducing seasickness, dehydration, hypothermia, anxiety, and other factors that contribute to loss of comfort and the will to survive.

This study evolved from the results of the environmental workshop in 1986 which identified baseline biological objectives for investigating potential environmental effects of the proposed Mattagami River hydroelectric extensions. The study was conducted in 1989 and 1990 to determine, using radiotelemetry, the presence/absence of lake sturgeon in the forebay of Little Long Generating Station prior to, during, and following spring 1989 freshet and to assess whether any of those fish are swept into the Adam Creek diversion channel; to determine if any of the radio tagged walleye and/or lake sturgeon are present in the downstream end of Adam Creek during spring freshet and the onset of spawning; to determine the seasonal distribution patterns for lake sturgeon within the defined study area throughout 1989; and to assess the limitations of radiotelemetry for such applications and make recommendations for improvement.

This report assesses the water quality of Pender Harbour, including Bargain Bay, on the Sechelt Peninsula. Water quality objectives are set to protect aquatic life, wildlife, primary-contact recreation, and shellfish harvesting for human consumption. All objectives are provisional pending collection of additional data. A monitoring program is recommended to check whether water quality objectives are being achieved, to finalize provisional objectives that have been proposed, and to increase understanding of environmental quality in Pender Harbour.

Sector analyses to examine the relative contribution of emissions in the United States and Canada [to] acidic wet deposition in Ontario, 1981-85

by H. Warmenhoven and D. Yap. Toronto : Environment Ontario, 1991. 43 p. : ill., maps. Bibliogr. ISBN 0-7729-6902-7

The use of tall stacks and high emission levels of fossil fuel combustion products has resulted in elevated atmospheric concentrations of several primary and secondary pollutants, such as oxides of nitrogen and sulphur, throughout the industrialized world. This in turn has resulted in significant increases in acidity levels from wet and dry deposition of the pollutants. Detailed understanding of source-receptor relationships requires information on source emissions, dispersion/transport, chemical transformation, and deposition at the receptor. As complete information of all these aspects is never available, a number of complimentary approaches are used, one of which is the use of air parcel trajectory sector analysis. This study used this method of analysis to assess the relative contributions of the U.S. sector, the Ohio Valley sector, and the Canada sector to acidic deposition in Ontario from 1981-85. This report provides results from that study.

On distingue 3 types d'accidents: ceux qui se produisent à un passage à niveau, les déraillements et les collisions. Ce sont les déraillements et les collisions que ce document examine. Il jette un coup d'oeil sur les tendances, les causes et les mesures parlementaires relatif aux accidents ferroviaires.

Seed losses due to spruce cone maggot, Strobilomyia neanthracina (Diptera: Anthomyiidae) in Newfoundland populations of white spruce, Picea glauca, (Moench) Voss

by A. Mosseler and P. Tricco. St. John's : Forestry Canada, Newfoundland and Labrador Region, 1991. v. 10 p. Bibliogr. (Information report ; N-X-278) ISSN 0704-7657 ISBN 0-662-19244-32 MICROLOG 92-04860 1 fiche

The spruce cone maggot is a major pest of white spruce and is responsible for considerable seed losses. Significant genetic variation in host susceptibility to cone pests has been observed in other tree species but there is little population-based information available on the susceptibility of white spruce to cone and seed predation by the cone maggot. This study quantified the effects of spruce cone maggot predation in Newfoundland populations of white spruce to assess seed losses, and to determine the components of population variation in infestation and damage levels. In 1986, when the project began, HY320 and Fielder were the only eligible varieties for CPS and CWSWS grades. Plant selections were made from populations generated by the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool wheat breeding program, forming the basis of the CPS and CWSWS programs. Crossing programs were initiated to improve kernel quality, pre-harvest dormancy, common bunt and loose smut resistance, stem and leaf rust resistance, and yield/maturity relationship. Preliminary yield testing of material selected in 1986 began in 1987 and continued in 1988. This report describes the experimental methods used and the results obtained. AG MS PR SC

A Sense-based, process model of knowledge and belief

by R.F. Hadley. Burnaby, B.C. : Simon Fraser University, Centre for Systems Science, 1991. 46 p. Bibliogr.
MICROLOG 92-05742 1 fiche (Available on fiche only)

This paper presents a process-oriented model of belief and knowledge which permits the representation of nested propositional attitudes within first-order logic. The paper presents a first-order logic, T-FOL, which permits the arbitrary nesting of sentences within propositional attitudes and with any predicate. An axiomatic, nested intensional model (NIM) of belief, which is described in the language of T-FOL is then presented. NIM provides a theory of belief-change which is sensitive to the empirical contingencies of epistemic processes. Finally, an application of NIM and T-FOL to inter-agent reasoning is presented. An example illustrates the manner in which an agent may make plausible inferences about some beliefs another agent is likely to acquire, without requiring the former agent to know the representation language of the latter agent.

by S. Pilarski, T. Kameda and A. Ivanov. Burnaby, B.C. : Simon Fraser University, Centre for Systems Science ; Laboratory for Computer and Communications Research, 1990. 15 p. Bibliogr.

MICROLOG 92-05802 1 fiche (Available on fiche only)

In the past, the analysis of aliasing probability dealt only with combinational faults, that is those that do not convert a combinational circuit into a sequential one. The results obtained so far are valid for stuck-at faults, which are commonly encountered in practice and cause sequential behaviour of initially combinational circuits. In general, faults that convert a combinational circuit (or subcircuit) into a sequential one are referred to as sequential faults. This paper shows that, as the test sequence length is increased, the probability of aliasing for such faults tends to 2-k, where k is the number of binary memory elements in a linear compactor, if the linear compactor has an irreducible characteristic polynomial. The results are also valid for circuits under test that are initially sequential. Some recent results of combinational faults are special cases of the results presented in this paper.

Setbacks from slope crests for structures

by D.M. Cruden and J.S. De Lugt. Edmonton : Alberta Municipal Affairs, Innovative Housing Grants Program, 1991. v, 108 p. : ill. Bibliogr. ISBN 0-88654-308-8

Many of the most desirable sites for residential developments are at the crests of river valley slopes, but such sites are subject to slope movements which can damage or destroy structures or services to them. While setbacks should be established to ensure the long-term safety of structures from slope movements, there is no standard design procedure for the specification of such setbacks. This project validated the Cruden, Tedder, and Thomson (1989) model for estimating setbacks for structures from the crest of slopes by applying it to cases involving slope movement resulting in property damage; assessed the model's impact on developed land within the immediate vicinity of slope failures examined; and reviewed the attributes and effects of the model for its further refinement and broader application.

From August 1988 to September 1990, the fertility, hatchability, and age of embryonic mortality of 50,000 broiler breeder hatching eggs at 11 hatches of Wynyard Hatchery and eight hatches at Canada Packers Hatchery were monitored and the number of cracked, rotten, and upside down eggs was recorded.

The fertility and early embryonic mortality were determined by candling all the eggs at six days of incubation and breaking open the eggs that appeared clear or had a blood ring. All of the eggs unhatched after 21 days of incubation were broken open to determine the age of embryonic mortality and the number of chicks hatched was recorded. Eggs from 14 farms and 41 flocks were monitored. Egg shell quality was determined by floating 168 day old eggs in three salt solutions to determine their specific gravity. A total of 51 egg weight measurements were taken for 33 flocks from 10 farms.

Data was collected from senior management, human resources personnel, plant nurses, ESL teachers and administrators, supervisors, instructors, and non-salaried workers who were, had been, or never had been in the ESL classes. Data collection methods included individual and group interviews, participant

This study represents a first attempt to identify and classify important natural features and landscapes within a 74,162 sq km area proposed for future large-scale forestry development. The study team, composed of terrain scientists, vegetation ecologists, fisheries biologists, and wildlife biologists, spent six months compiling and evaluating existing information on the area, conducting interviews, and carrying out reconnaissance level field surveys, to identify sites that met the various criteria established. The study classified the sites on the basis of their regional, provincial, national or international significance; evaluated the relative sensitivity of the sites to major types of land use activities; and identified issues and concerns that are important for protection and management of significant natural features. The adequacy of the existing information base was also assessed and priorities were identified for filling major data gaps.

It then introduces the multivariate filter and provides measures of potential output for Canada. This report was designed to establish the technical and economic viability to produce activated carbon from anthracite. Previous work at the bench scale had shown that activated carbon with very high surface areas could be obtained in a one-step process, with gas produced simultaneously suitable for power generation. In this work, a fluidized bed pilot plant was constructed and operated to produce kilogram-sized samples allowing for detailed sample testing in end-use applications of the carbons and an economic evaluation of the process concept. The project reviewed recent technology for the production of activated carbons and market assessments for activated carbons and identified potential applications for the pilot plant material; assessed the Mount Klappen development and integrated the technology of activated carbon production into the plant development profile; acquired and prepared appropriate samples of Mount Klappen anthracite; designed and constructed an experimental pilot plant and carried out a series of pilot scale tests; assessed the activated carbon and gases produced and developed product application tests for specific product applications; and provided an engineering assessment and preliminary cost analysis for full scale activated carbon production within the Mount Klappen plant concept.

The Polish energy production industry is based almost entirely on coal and the disposal of wastes from power stations has caused growing environmental concern. To alleviate this problem, a new method of disposing of the waste was developed whereby fly ash is mixed with water to make dense suspensions (AWDS) to which other wastes can be added. These suspensions remain fluid for several days and can be pumped and transported hydraulically, afterwards setting to form a solid, virtually without separation of water. The solid resembles soft rock, and its permeability to water and gases is low. This report briefly describes the development of AWDS technology in Poland, its present status, and its properties through published literature, patent descriptions, interviews with power station and mine engineers and the research people involved, and site visits.

Ontario. Water Resources Branch. Toronto : The Branch, 1992. ii, 123 p. : ill. ISBN 0-7729-8922-2 MICROLOG 92-06615 2 fiche

The Municipal-Industrial Strategy for Abatement (MISA) program is a regulatory initiative designed to eliminate toxic contaminants from municipal and industrial discharges to Ontario's waterways. Under the first phase of the program, effluent monitoring regulations were promulgated for nine industrial sectors, requiring each to perform 12 months of intensive monitoring of its effluents. The organic chemical manufacturing sector, as one of the nine industrial sectors, began its regulatory monitoring period on 1 October 1989. This report presents the data obtained for the first six months of the monitoring covering 1 October 1989 to 31 March 1990. Data are presented through tables and graphs as six-month average concentrations and loadings for all plant effluents. Intake water data are presented alongside effluent data to provide a clearer picture of the actual contaminant contribution from each plant. The plants are grouped by the receiving water basins to which they discharge, the St. Clair River, Lake Erie/Ontario, and the St. Lawrence River.

Slope stability analysis is an essential task for managers of natural resources in steep land or in areas subjected to shallow mass movement. A number of different strategies for predicting areas of slope instability, or modelling their likelihood, have been developed. The most common strategy for assessing landslide hazard is that of modelling. Several different modelling strategies have been developed. They vary from the simplest, correlating a single variable such as slope gradient or a soil property with the occurrence of mass movements, to multifactor or multivariate analysis. This paper investigates the potential to use these models for slope stability mapping. First, a short review of digital elevation models is presented, and then the use of empirical modelling within the context of this project is explored. Finally, the rationale for the stability classifications developed in this paper are addressed.

An English language abridgement of Tendances de la société en Ontario francophone, a report prepared by TVOntario to facilitate the planning process of French Programming Services. It presents a list of societal trends and, for each, the implications for target audiences (adults, youth, children). Demographic trends relate to: the ethnocultural composition of Ontario; changes in the family structure; the aging of the population; and the demographic decline of the francophone population. Political trends include: the role of research and development and professional training in the industrial strategy; partnerships between governments, the private sector, and labour; media empires; integration of minorities versus autonomous institutions; the French Languages Services Act; the Meech Lake Accord; and internal conflicts in Franco-Ontario. Economic trends pertain to: international competition; the shift to service- and information-based sectors; jobless growth; training programs; the aging workforce; the undereducation of francophones; economic inequity within Franco-Ontarian society; and francophone entrepreneurship. Cultural trends include: cultural sovereignty; the marketing of francophone cultural industries; ethnic socialization; the new values; the influence of new technologies; and French-language multiculturalism. Among the educational trends identified are: distance education; illiteracy; immersion programs; Bill 75; Linguistically mixed Schools; and postsecondary education. Societal trends include: the effects of technological change on social services; poverty; environmental issues; drug use; the lack of health and social service professionals; the slow redefinition of sex roles and the status of women; the new pay equity law; domestic violence; single parenting; and the role of Franco-Ontarian women.

In the early 1980s, the demand for soft-shell clams in Cole Harbour on the eastern shore of Nova Scotia led to increased fishing pressure and a need was felt for an assessment of the available stock. This survey was undertaken in the summer of 1984, when about 28% of the flats were closed to commercial and recreational clam fishing due to bacterial contamination. Sampling was conducted at seven open areas (available for fishing) and four closed (unavailable for fishing) areas and standing stock collected was divided into those with shells under 43 mm, those with shells 44-49 mm, and those with shells over 50 mm. Total recruitable stock was all those over 44 mm shell length. A growth rate analysis was also conducted.

Soil clean-up guidelines for decommissioning of industrial lands : background and rationale for development

Ontario. Phytotoxicology Section. Toronto : Ministry of the Environment, Air Resources Branch, 1991. vi, 175 p. Bibliogr. (Report, ARB-207-88 PHYTO) ISBN 0-7729-8109-4

In a number of cases since 1984, the Phytotoxicology Section of the Ontario Ministry of the Environment has been asked for guidelines to the clean-up of oil refinery lands. While some guidelines were developed in 1984, they were not all suitable. In addition, guidelines were requested for applications to agricultural situations. It was felt that the same guidelines could apply to both agricultural and oil situations. This document describes the rationale for the development of guidelines for soil pH, arsenic, cadmium, chromium, cobalt, copper, lead, mercury, molybdenum, nickel, selenium, silver, zinc, nitrogen, oil and grease, electrical conductivity, and sodium adsorption ratio. In addition, provisional guidelines for antimony, barium, beryllium, and vanadium are considered.

This study was undertaken to determine whether wood protection activities were resulting in localized soil contamination at concentrations requiring action. Surface soil samples were collected at 11 wood protection facilities in the Atlantic Region in 1989 to determine the concentration of contaminants at those sites. The samples were then analyzed for chlorophenols, boron, and PCPs.

Public and professional awareness of the impacts of forest development on fish and watershed values has increased greatly over the past decade. Proper planning and implementation of soil erosion and sediment control procedures must be an integral part of forest resource management. In cooperation with the Fish/Forestry Interaction Program, Ministry of Forests' Forest Science Research Branch, and Fletcher Challenge Canada Ltd., Terrasol developed a formal approach to soil erosion and sediment control planning for managed forest watershed in B.C. The approach presented in this paper was implemented on the Shomar Creek watershed and moves sediment and erosion control operations from being post-damage short-term treatments into an active, cost-effective mitigation program.

Historical lead emissions from both the Tonolli Company of Canada Ltd. and the nearby former Exide battery plant contributed to elevated soil lead levels on neighbouring commercial-industrial and residential properties in the Dixie Road/Queensway area of Mississauga. In 1987 a soil sampling program was conducted in the commercial/industrial area, as well as part of the residential area. In 1988 and 1989 a further sampling program was conducted on residential and publicly accessible properties (south of Queensway) not previously sampled within the 500 ppm contour through to one property beyond this contour to ensure that all properties potentially affected by Tonolli/Exide emissions, at soil level of 500 ppm lead or higher, were identified. This report presents the soil lead results which have been found to date throughout this residential sampling area

In response to a reported spill from the Cameco uranium refinery on 16-17 May 1990, a soil and vegetation sampling program was carried out to determine the levels of uranium. The company estimated that 183 kg of uranium were released. The sampling program took place on 29 May 1990 using the seven permanent sample plot locations previously established and one other site to better represent the area to the northeast of the refinery. At each location, triplicate samples of surface soil and foliage from trembling aspen were collected. The suspended particulate monitor results for 17 May 1990 are also summarized in the report.

Low-level combustible wastes such as rags, paper wipers, packings, coveralls, etc., comprise approximately 70 percent of the solid radioactive wastes generated annually at Ontario Hydro nuclear generating stations. To compact the wastes further, they are burnt in an incinerator at Bruce Nuclear Power Development. Part I of the program to deal with these ashes was an investigation into the suitability of cement, bitumen, polyester resin, and polyethylene for immobilizing the ashes. In part 2, the suitability of modified sulphur cement as a solidification matrix was examined and compaction techniques for producing ash waste forms was assessed; both bottom and baghouse ashes were investigated. Results are compared with those obtained earlier, and based on these results, a concept for managing the ashes is outlined.

This paper describes two variants of a tabu search heuristic, one deterministic and the other probabilistic, for the maximum clique problem. The heuristic may be viewed as a natural alternate implementation of tabu search for this problem when compared to existing ones. The paper also presents a random graph generator which produces graphs with larger clique sizes than comparable ones obtained by classical random graph generating techniques. Computational results on a large set of test problems randomly generated with this new generator are reported and compared with those of other appropriate methods.

This paper addresses the following questions: How large are the output costs of disinflation in Canada? Are these costs temporary as predicted by natural-rate models, or are they permanent, as predicted by hysteresis models? Are the cost of disinflation higher at lower rates of inflation? Are they higher when the economy is at or below full employment? It seeks answers to these questions within the context of an expectations-augmented Phillips curve, a framework which permits direct calculation of the output-inflation trade-off.

This study reviewed available information on the recovery of tagged adult salmon to determine which factors influence the survival of hatchery-reared smolts. Sixty-nine groups of 2+ Atlantic salmon smolts and 27 groups of 1 or more smolts produced at the Mactaquac FCS were marked with modified Carlin tags and released in the Saint John River, New Brunswick, from 1973-88. During the same period, 35 groups of tagged 1 or more smolts produced at the Mersey FCS were released in the LaHaye River, Nova Scotia. The numbers of tagged adult salmon that were later recovered in distant and local commercial fisheries, in Native food fisheries, by anglers and at collection facilities operated by the Dept. of Fisheries and Oceans provided a measure of the survival rate of the various smolt groups.

Le présent document contient des faits et des statistiques sur les différents types d'événements que signalent les compagnies de chemin de fer et les compagnies de productoduc sous compétence fédérale. La première partie de ce document traite des événements ferroviaires, la deuxième ceux de productoduc. Chacune est subdivisée en trois chapitres: un résumé des statistiques sous forme de texte explicatif, une suite de tableaux analytiques sur les événements survenus entre 1981 et 1990 et une annexe contenant des explications et des définitions. Les événements ferroviaires englobent les accidents comme les collisions, les déraillements et les accidents aux passages à niveau de même que les personnes heurtées par du matériel roulant de chemin de fer. Les accidents et incidents de productoduc englobent ceux qui entraînent des blessures ou des morts, les mauvais fonctionnements comme les déversements, les fuites, les ruptures, les incendies ou les explosions, et tout autre événement qui entraîne la mise hors d'usage d'une conduite relevant des compétences de l'Office national de l'énergie.

An inventory of the marine foreshore fish habitat characteristics of Sooke Harbour and Basin was conducted to aid in the evaluation and planning of future foreshore development. Biophysical traits of the backshore, intertidal, and subtidal zones were assessed visually by walking, snorkelling, boating, and/or diving. Sixty-two reaches within the Inlet are described in detail, based on substrate and/or vegetation composition. The location of major eelgrass and kelp beds, which are important fish habitat areas, is also reported. To further examine the significance of fish habitat within Sooke Inlet, benthic invertebrate samples collected from two representative substrates (silt/mud and gravel/cobble) are analyzed and salmonid escapement, herring spawn and shellfish harvest data are presented. In addition, human use of the foreshore is described from records provided by the provincial Ministry of Lands and Parks and from visual observations made during the survey. In light of increasing development pressure, concentrated mainly in Sooke Harbour, recommendations are given for the protection and maintenance of the highly productive fish habitat within the Inlet.

As part of the technical assistance program to Atomic Energy of Canada Ltd., (AECL), the contaminant transport properties and retardation capabilities of selected cement-based grout materials were evaluated. This report presents the results of laboratory experiments using six mixtures of sulphate resistant Portland cement and silica fume at two water to cement ratios. Diffusion coefficients were measured for tritiated water and chlorine 38 under simulated saline groundwater conditions. Tortuosity factors were calculated from the results of the diffusion tests and retardation factors for cesium 137 and strontium 85 were estimated from measured distribution coefficient, bulk density, and porosity values.

The system of apartheid in South Africa has long been one of the most controversial issues in world politics. Because of the risk that confrontations between Blacks and Whites and within each of these communities might degenerate into armed conflict and because of the pressures applied by the international community to persuade South Africa to end apartheid, the South African government has accelerated the reform process. This review outlines what is at stake in this constitutional reform by examining the confrontations within South African society and the role of the international community.

The situation in South Africa has changed considerably since F. W. de Klerk became President in 1989. Nelson Mandela has been released from prison and discriminatory laws have been repealed. However, South Africa is still marked by violence and constitutional negotiations are bound to be difficult. Indeed, South Africa is only now entering what could be the most difficult period of its history. This review outlines what is at stake in this constitutional reform by examining the confrontations within South African society and the role of the international community.

Spottail shiners have been used for contaminant biomonitoring in all the Great Lakes and connecting channels as part of the Great Lakes international surveillance plan. Because of their localized nearshore habitat, spottail shiners are useful indicators of contaminant bioavailability for specific localities. This report summarizes changes in water quality by assessing the present status and temporal trends of bioavailable organochlorine compounds from selected nearshore sites on the Great Lakes. Contaminant concentrations in forage fish were also used to assess compliance with IJC aquatic life guidelines and the fish flesh criteria of New York State for site-specific and lake-wide assessments. The findings and conclusions of this report were based on analytical data from young-of-the-year forage fish collected from 1975-88.

Square-law device analysis for the detection and timing estimation of a burst BPSK signal (U)

by W.R. Seed. Ottawa : Defence Research Establishment Ottawa, 1991. ix, 22 p. : ill. Bibliogr. (Technical note ; no. 91-06)
MICROLOG 92-02067 1 fiche

A square-law device is often found in the receiver front-end of radar and communication systems, with the output consisting of a baseband component and a component at twice the input frequency. The first is used to detect the presence of a signal and the second is used to collapse the signal energy of a binary phase-shift keyed (BPSK) signal to a much narrower band for carrier phase estimation of the input signal. This paper analyzes the two outputs of a square-law device in terms of output signal-to-noise ratio (SNR) for a burst BPSK-modulated pulse. After first deriving the device's output for a general BPSK signal, a closer examination is performed for a 13-bit Barker code. The SNR of a BPSK-modulated pulse following the envelope detector and lowpass filter is compared to that obtained from a CW pulse having an equal power and duration. From the comparison, an expression is derived.

Effluent monitoring was conducted in May 1987 twice per week at the Cole Drain, the Polysar Biox Unit, the Polysar 72 inch sewer, the Dow 1st St. complex sewers, and the Dow 2nd, 3rd and 5th sewers. Ecosystem monitoring consisted of bodyburden analysis for benthos and sculpins, spottail shiners, cladophora, clams, macrophytes and phytoplankton, along with an estimation of total biomass and effluent toxicity and mutagenicity tests. Investigative sampling to determine the concentration of trace organics at the sediment-water interface was conducted at 43 stations from the river headwaters to the St. Clair Delta.

This report presents the results of a laboratory study carried out to investigate the stability of bitumen-bound coarse single-sized (open-graded) pavement aggregates under dynamic plate loading. All aggregate samples comprised 100 percent crushed limestone and were constructed over a 100 mm layer of compacted Granular A to simulate a typical field application. The open-graded aggregate was pre-mixed with a bitumen binder to give a maximum asphalt cement content of about 2 percent. One test was carried out with no binder in order to compare unbound sample performance with bound samples. To establish an equivalency factor for unbound OGD layers and Granular A, a single test with a double layer of Granular A comprising 100 percent crushed limestone was also performed. All plate bearing tests were carried out at room temperature (about 20°C).

The chinook salmon of the Somass River system (including Robertson Creek Hatchery production) are the most abundant stock of this species on Vancouver Island and make important contributions to troll, net and sport fisheries in the U.S. and Canadian waters. Surveys have been conducted since 1984, but have always been less accurate than expected. This 1990 survey counted all chinook, coho, sockeye, steelhead, and other salmonids passing through the Stamp Falls Fishway between September 11 and November 20, 1990, quantified the random error associated with species identification and mis-counting of fish migrating through the fishway; and estimated the number of fish migrating through the fishway during periods when reliable counting could not be conducted. Age, size, sex, and hatchery contributions are described using data from carcass recovery and live returns to Robertson Creek hatchery. Total escapement of chinook are given, along with estimates for coho and sockeye.

In November 1989, the drinking water surveillance program (DWSP) detected the first high concentration of N-Nitrosodimethylamine (NDMA) in drinking water in Elmira, Ontario. No NDMA was detected (using a detection limit of 50 parts per trillion (ppt)) in similar DWSP studies at over 40 locations in Ontario. An interim maximum acceptable concentration (IMAC) of 14 ppt was adopted by the Ministry to reduce NDMA discharges and a control order was issued to Uniroyal Chemical Ltd. An expert committee was established in May 1990 to identify potential guideline numbers and associated risk levels based on health considerations. All pathways of exposure to NDMA via air, water, soil, diet, and consumer products were evaluated and the health risks to NDMA exposure at various levels over a lifetime (incremental lifetime cancer risk) was assessed. After this review, the Ministry developed a more stringent IMAC for NDMA of 9 ppt. The Advisory Committee on Environmental Standards was then requested to carry out a public consultation on the more stringent IMAC and to recommend a maximum acceptable concentration. This report presents the results of the Advisory Committee's consultation, including the public health significance of NDMA, a description of the public consultation process, a review of public comment, and a summary of the recommendations.

Softwood lumber (other than cedar) is susceptible to attack by sapstain and mold fungi which cause stains and blemishes, reducing its marketability, and also causes structural damage to the wood. To protect freshly cut lumber, it is treated with chemical fungicides (antisapstains) prior to export. However, these fungicides easily leach from the wood during rainfall. This report provides a standard method to determine the concentration of antisapstain chemical in rainwater leachate dripping from treated lumber and to determine how the leachability of resin acids from lumbers is affected by the application of antisapstain chemical; and a standard method to predict the concentration of antisapstain chemical and resin acids in rainwater runoff from a treated lumber storage yard.

Pressure vessels such as rail and highway tank cars carrying pressure liquefied gases like propane are equipped with a pressure relief valve (PRV), designed to release the contents of the tank in the event that an uncontrolled pressure increase occurs, such as accidental exposure to fire. On occasion, these PRVs have malfunctioned, resulting in slow response, partial opening, failure to reclose, or failure to open at all. This study presents the results of a literature search and review of PRV technologies involved in railway tank cars, highway tankers, stationary storage vessels, and the nuclear power and chemical processing industries. Specific areas investigated included sticking or jamming of PRVs, ambient or fire effects on PRV performance, and effects of age on PRV performance.

Statistical analyses of metal levels in fish of the Columbia River near the international boundary, 1980 to 1988

Norecol Environmental Consultants Ltd. Vancouver, B.C. : Environment Canada, Inland Waters, Pacific and Yukon Region, Water Quality Branch, 1989. iv, 75 p. Bibliogr. CSI 22150.204.
MICROLOG 92-06878 1 fiche

From 1980-83, a study was conducted of heavy metal levels in fish from the Columbia River upstream of the international boundary to address concerns that levels of mercury and other metals in fish tissues may be increasing because of discharges from Cominco's lead-zinc smelter at Trail or because of mobilization of biologically available metals from several reservoirs upstream. Based on the results of the 1980-83 program, an ongoing monitoring program was recommended to provide data for comparison with Health and Welfare Canada guidelines for edible fish flesh and to monitor long-term trends in biologically available metals. The recommended program included sampling and analyses for mercury, cadmium, chromium, copper, lead, and zinc in large scale suckers, mountain whitefish, and walleye, as well as white sturgeon if it could be obtained from local fishermen. Annual sampling was conducted from 1986-88. Fish collected included the four recommended species plus rainbow trout. Muscle tissue from all species collected was analyzed for mercury, and muscle tissue from all species, except sturgeon, was analyzed for cadmium, copper, lead, zinc, and (in 1988 only) nickel. This report presents the results of the 3 years monitored and compares them with the results from the 1980-83 study.

The commercial harvesting of fish from Lake Huron is controlled through area specific allocations and licensee specific quotas which are subject to annual review and revision. This document traces annual harvests from 1980-91 and relates those harvests to the allocations for those years that quota-control has been in place; traces the relative abundance of the primary commercial species through data derived from commercial fishing reports; describes the character of the harvest and of the populations through age and size data taken from on-board sampling of representative commercial catches; and presents a tracking of year-to-year changes in reproduction through independent fishing together with comments on the likely impact of the recruiting year classes. Forecasts of changes in the supply of commercial fish are made based on the composite picture developed.

The giant scallop is commercially harvested along the coast of the Atlantic provinces and is an important part of the economy of coastal communities, representing a landed value of 3-4 million dollars annually. This report gives an overview of the fisheries statistics for the giant scallop landing in the southern portion of the Gulf of St. Lawrence in scallop fishing areas 21-24. Catch and effort data are provided from 1968-90, sorted and compiled to obtain landings (kg of scallop meat, scallop roe and live scallop), landed values and price/kg for each of the fishing areas. Supplementary B landings (estimations of landings not sold to a registered buyer) are sorted and presented separately. The fishing effort is estimated by sorting the catch and effort data by Canadian fishing vessel number. The potential fishing effort is estimated from the number of scallop fishing licences issued in 1990 in each fishing area.

This report presents the catch and effort data for the Iceland scallop and giant scallop fisheries along the western coast of Newfoundland from 1984-90. The data collected from 1984 was selected because of overall quality. Prior to 1984, catch and effort data was compiled and recorded for monthly landings without information on the fishing effort (number of fishing vessels involved). The socio-economic particularities of the fisheries are also discussed.

This paper evaluates the corrosion of welds, joints, and crevices in steam generator components which would be exposed to chemical cleaning solvents during a Bruce 'A' steam generator tubesheet chemical clean, as well as studying the effect of galvanic coupling of welds to the I-600 tube bundle. Full size corrosion test specimens representing carbon steel, I-600, and stainless steel weld combinations and joints in identical configurations to what would be found in the steam generator were fabricated. Specimen surfaces which would not normally be exposed to chemical cleaning solvents were masked with epoxy paint then subjected to a multi-step chemical clean consisting of three copper removal, two iron removal, and ten rinse steps at flows expected during a tubesheet chemical clean. Visual examination and optical microscopy were then conducted.

This study includes a brief overview of engine 6060, the tourism resource that is the subject of the opportunity analysis. It summarizes the findings of a preliminary evaluation of possible long-term uses of 6060 and concludes that a charter program of short and long-haul excursions appears to represent the most attractive use of the engine. It also explores the feasibility of utilizing engine 6060 in a charter excursion service. It examines industry and market considerations, operating and equipment aspects, organizational implications, expected financial viability, development risks, and tourism and economic impacts, and formulates general conclusions regarding the feasibility of a steam charter service.

In 1987, the province developed a provincial conservation strategy identifying the connection between natural resources and the future of the resource-based industries. This current strategy builds on the work and accomplishments of the original conservation strategy and broadens the focus to include all aspects of sustainable development. The document provides an overview of the strategy, then details the goals for soil erosion, water resources, managing wastes, conserving the ecosystem, protecting the atmosphere, and public involvement. Methods of improving the approaches through environmental impact assessment, effective enforcement, partnerships, and quality of service are also discussed. A summary of strategies and a discussion of future directions concludes the document.

A Strategic analysis of waste plastics reprocessing in British Columbia

Peat Marwick Stevenson & Kellogg. Victoria : B.C. Environment, Environmental Protection Division, Municipal Solid and Biomedical Waste Branch, 1991. iv, 71 p. Bibliogr. At head of title: British Columbia, handle with care
MICROLOG 92-01353 1 fiche

In late 1989, a plan was endorsed by the B.C. government to reduce municipal solid waste by 50 percent per capita by 2000 through a combination of source reduction, reuse, and recycling measures. A number of studies were commissioned to evaluate existing markets for recyclable materials and identify ways to expand reprocessing activities in the province. This study determined why the waste plastics industry is not well developed, both in supply of waste plastics for reprocessing and in demand for recycled plastic products. The study determined the potential to expand the infrastructure, processing capabilities, and markets for recyclable plastics in the province; identified barriers and opportunities to expand waste plastics reprocessing, including suggestions to capitalize on the opportunities and overcome the barriers; and recommended the types of plastics reprocessing projects that the provincial government should support and the options to landfill disposal of waste plastics that cannot be economically recycled or reprocessed.

Strategies to Reduce the Over-Incarceration of Aboriginal People in Canada (1990 : Prince Albert, Sask.). Regina : University of Regina, School of Human Justice, Prairie Justice Research, 1990. 76 p. Bibliogr. ISBN 0-7731-0184-5. MICROLOG 92-07172 2 fiche

The purpose of the consultation was to provide a forum for researchers from across Canada to discuss their research findings on Aboriginal peoples and justice issues and to identify future research directions on this theme. An important objective of the consultation was to challenge participants to consider a long-standing and well-documented problem of the over-incarceration of Canada's Aboriginal peoples from emerging perspectives of Aboriginal self-determination and self-government, and in the light of the recent judicial inquiries in Manitoba, Nova Scotia and Alberta. This document contains a summary of research themes.

As part of the strategy for improvement of Don River water quality study, a quantitative methodology was developed to estimate the effectiveness of control options. A variety of control options are evaluated and their impact upon water quality considered. This supporting document presents the methods used, and the response of water quality at four locations. A spreadsheet analysis was used to establish instream concentrations for suspended solids, total phosphorus, ammonia, copper, lead, and fecal coliforms at the Upper Don, the Middle Don (meeting of East and West Don), the Lower Don (at Lakeshore Road), and at the mouth of Massey Creek, and estimate the effectiveness of various mitigative options in reducing concentrations and loadings of the above parameters. A loading-dilution model was used to evaluate the effectiveness of remediation. The methodology was used to evaluate seasonal conditions as well as for dry weather and specific-sized rainfall events.

In the spring of 1988, the TAWMS Don River water quality improvement study was initiated to summarize water quality problems, relate these problems to sources and provide a range of improvement actions leading to various levels of control for water quality improvements. The study on the strategy for water quality management in the Don River evaluates the costs and effectiveness of different source control strategies in the Don River watershed. This supporting document presents a framework for evaluating the potential response of the Don River fishery and of toxicity to water quality management, using an ecosystem-based set of goals for management of the watershed. The framework is the basis for developing a levels of protection approach to establishing targets for auditing water quality improvements.

Three broad northerly-trending structural zones with different stratigraphies are recognized. These are the Western Oak Hill sequence, the central realm of Sutton schists, and an eastern Mansonville sequence. Field work was carried out in the summer of 1957-59 and three weeks in 1979. The eastern part of the outcrop of the Oak Hill Group was mapped in detail (1:16,000 scale) aided by aerial photographs, the rest of the area was mapped on a 1:25,000 scale.

This paper describes two structural equation models for multiple respondent data where the unit of analysis consists of a set of individuals with common membership in a social network. The paper focuses on the structural differences between the two models and on the consequences of attempting to fit one model to data generated by the structure of the other model. Differences are described by comparing the within-member and cross-member reduced-form slopes for the two models. Two data sets are then analyzed to illustrate the concept. The first is the matrix of correlations and standard deviations reported by Thomson and Williams (1982) in their paper on the effects of wives' and husbands' respective tastes for children on their respective plans for having another child. The second comes from the Jennings and Niemi (1971, 1981) study of political socialization in which high school seniors and one or both parents were interviewed in 1965 and then again in 1973.

Seven plot sites were selected where 20 trees of each of trembling aspen and white pine (where available) were tagged, measured and evaluated annually for condition and growth. Soil and vegetation (foliage of white pine, trembling aspen, and grass) samples were collected annually for chemical analyses at these sites from 1981-87. A separate collection was made in 1985 at four of the plot sites which included foliage of several plant species as well as one-, two-, and three-year-old needles of white and red pine. A variety of wild edibles were collected in 1986 in the vicinity of the refinery. All samples were analyzed for uranium, copper, nickel, lead, cobalt, zinc, iron, sulphur, calcium, magnesium, and potassium. An high-volume sampling program was also initiated in the community of Blind River in 1982, to determine if the ERL operations would have any effect on the levels of suspended particulates and their associated radiological burden in ambient air. High volume filters were collected on a six-day schedule and were weighed to determine total suspended particulate loadings and radiological analyses were conducted for total uranium, thorium 228, radium 226, gross alpha, and beta.

This study was undertaken to provide information necessary for breeding for resistance to septoria nodorum blotch, caused by Leptosphaeria nodorum, and to tan spot, caused by Pyrenophora tritici-repentis, in wheat. Cultivars from different countries were screened for resistance to these diseases in seedling tests conducted under controlled environmental conditions. The genetic control of resistance was studied in seedling tests using crosses between resistant and susceptible parents. Race formation in L. nodorum was studied in controlled environment tests by inoculating a set of cultivars with a range of isolates collected from different areas in Saskatchewan. Field tests were conducted in 1988 and 1989 at Saskatoon and Weirsdale to study the association of resistance with agronomic traits and to relate seedling and adult plant disease reaction.

In the mining industry, ammonium nitrate-based explosives are often used to fracture the rock mass, leading to the accumulation of nitrogen bearing by-products, particularly ammonia, in the mine effluents. A study is now underway on methods to remove the ammonia from the effluents using zeolites, which have been used for many years in the food industry for the adsorption of ammonia. Samples of zeolite mineral as received, both washed and loaded with ammonia, were submitted for examination by thermogravimetry/Fourier Transform infrared spectroscopy in inert and oxidizing atmospheres up to 900°C. The results were compared with those of zeolite before loading. X-ray diffraction was used as a supplementary technique. Desorption trends were examined during heating and to identify the gaseous species.

Findings of Phase I of a project to identify the most significant niche opportunities for biotechnology-based development within the animal husbandry areas. Phase I of the project identified and listed the major issues, products, and techniques of significance to the biotechnology industry and provided an initial assessment of the commercial significance of these areas and the desirability of further research into beef, dairy, swine, and equine husbandry. Research taking place in Canada today, as well as potential applications, were identified to define the capabilities of the Canadian biotechnology sector. The report is based on interviews with scientists and business people, reviews of published research papers, articles and data, and a review of in-house market information.

The Phase I report documented 11 mechanisms through which biotechnology may be used to develop products for the animal husbandry industry. It was then determined that uni- and multi-valent vaccines, products which improve feed efficiency, and products which improve carcass quality should be the topics of Phase II research. While the first of these areas is specific, the second and third are more general and can take in a number of areas in which biotechnology might be applied. The investigations therefore focused on means of achieving enhanced feed efficiency and improved carcass quality through biotechnical processes which are technically feasible at this time or are expected to be in the next 1-5 years. The report first gives a global market overview for beef, dairy, and swine, then discusses the animal health product market opportunities, the regulatory issues, the Canadian and international competitive environment, and an international overview of the government role in biotechnology.

In 1987, a survey of Canagagigue Creek was undertaken as part of the Municipal-Industrial Strategy for Abatement (MISA) pilot site study to evaluate the extent of contamination of the bottom sediments and the effects, if any, of the contaminants on the resident biota. A number of potential sources of contaminants exist along the creek, the most notable ones being the Uniroyal Chemical Plant and the Elmira Sewage Treatment plant. Additional sources include agricultural and urban runoff. In 1987, six stations were surveyed along the creek, upstream, at, and downstream of the Town of Elmira. Study components included surficial sediment chemistry, bottom water chemistry, contaminant levels in benthic invertebrates (oligochaetes and chironomids) and bottom-dwelling fish, and benthic enumeration studies. In addition, the fine sediment fraction was analyzed using a sequential extraction scheme to determine the distribution of metals in the various geochemical phases. Chemical analyses on sediment and bottom water were carried out for nutrients, metals, PCBs and pesticides, PAHs, chlorinated aromatics, and sediment particle size. Benthic organisms were also collected and analyzed for PCBs and pesticides, PAHs and chlorinated aromatics as well as percent lipid content and ash.

A survey of the sediment and bottom waters of the Grand River in the vicinity of Kitchener was carried out in 1986 and 1987 as part of the Municipal-Industrial Strategy for Abatement (MISA) pilot site investigations. In June 1986, eight stations were sampled along the Grand River, from north of Bridgeport downstream to Freeport. Sampling was repeated at seven of these stations in November 1986. Only sediments were sampled in November and biota were not sampled at all. In May-June 1987, three stations were surveyed in Kitchener, upstream, at, and downstream of the Waterloo WPCP. Sediment and water samples were collected in a follow-up survey in October. The study components in 1987 included surficial sediment chemistry, bottom water chemistry, and contaminated levels in benthic invertebrates (oligochaetes) and bottom-dwelling fish (longnose dace, emerald shiners, rainbow darters and white suckers). In addition, the fine sediment fraction was analyzed using a sequential extraction scheme to determine the distribution of metals in the various geochemical phases. A study was carried out along the St. Mary's River in the vicinity of Sault Ste Marie as part of the In-place Pollutants Program of 1985 and the Municipal-Industrial Strategy for Abatement (MISA) pilot site program in 1987 to determine the environmental impacts that discharges from a variety of sources along the river were having on the bottom water, sediments, and the associated biota. The study established the extent of contamination of the sediments through measurement of the sediment concentrations of metals, organochlorine pesticides, PCBs, PAHs, and chlorinated aromatics. Concentrations of these were also determined in the overlying water and resident biota (benthic invertebrates and fish) to assess the nature and extent of contaminant movement from the sediments. Finally, the study also sought to determine whether contaminants in sediments were adversely affecting aquatic organisms

Sheldon Point is located in southern New Brunswick in the coastal lowlands along the north shore of the Bay of Fundy in the city of Saint John. The Sheldon Point deposit is a linear ridge that reaches an elevation 45 m above sea level and is composed mainly of gravel, but also includes sand, fine grained sediments, and diamic. This report describes the physiography and general glacial geology of the surrounding area and the sedimentology of the moraine, discusses its relationship to regional patterns of deglaciation, describes the biostratigraphy, and presents a model for the formation of shallow tidewater glacier moraines. Study to determine the proportion of the peak ozone levels in Toronto resulting from the long range transport (LRT) of ozone and precursors; to determine whether the relationship between peak ozone levels and meteorological parameters can be used to predict the peak ozone levels and hence the Air Quality Index for the afternoon and early evening; and to determine the relationship between the peak hour ozone level and the maximum 8-hour running average of ozone the same day and what levels of 8-hour averages relate to peak hour levels of 80 ppb (moderate air quality) and 120 ppb (poor air quality). Peak hour ozone levels were selected each day from May to September inclusive for 1988 and 1989 during which Pearson International Airport reported temperatures equal to or exceeding 23°C and the cloud cover was equal or less than four-tenths opacity. This report summarizes a laboratory study aimed at the development of a new, low heat requirement recovery method for heavy oils and bitumen. The method, called Vapex, employs saturated propane (or generally hydrocarbon) vapours to extract heavy oils from the formation through pairs of horizontal wells. It is closely related to the steam-assisted gravity drainage process but with the steam chamber replaced with a chamber containing hydrocarbon vapour at its dew point. The laboratory research used a scaled, physical model with 62 thermocouples confined in a pressure vessel, two load cells, and a computer interface for recording and displaying data.

For the past 10 years, the Canadian Coast Guard, in discussion with the marine industry, has been developing structural steel toughness requirements for Arctic-class ships on the basis of Arctic navigation experience. The requirements were found to be consistent with the NKK approach for specifying minimum steel toughness requirements for ocean-going vessels and therefore were incorporated into the Canadian Arctic Safety and Pollution Prevention Regulations (CASPPR). This study of an investigation and an earlier comparison study provides verification for the minimum steel toughness requirements specified in CASPPR. Large scale wide plate tests were conducted to verify the NKK fracture toughness - Charpy toughness correlation and to assess the validity of the more recently developed failure analysis diagram for assessing fracture toughness requirement in the elastic plastic regime.

Ontario Public School Boards' Association's response reflects the views of those with responsibility for the elementary and secondary education of future university students. The response uses the framework and numbering system set out in the call for submissions. The questions addressed are: what place does quality of education enjoy among the priorities of Canadian universities, and does this differ from one to another; barriers to improving education within the university; does high quality education require an international dimension, international activities, and the presence of foreign students; are various groups in society under-enrolled in universities or in certain programs, what barriers exist, and how can they be removed, has the expansion of enrolment meant a lower average learning ability among students; keeping up with the demand for part-time and continuing education; is the attrition rate too high, and how can it be reduced, how important is the quality of teaching to a good university education, improving the prestige of teaching and teachers at universities, measures to improve faculty teaching methods; relevance and curriculum; coordination and cooperation; and the impact of universities on the quality and practices of secondary schools and improving coordination between them.

The Ontario Public School Boards' Association (OPSBA) discusses the nature of the concern for vulnerable children in the context of the school system. There is neither mandate nor resources to provide services for children at risk for social, emotional, or behavioural problems; the consequences for both the individual and society are enormous. OPSBA provides a list of potential preventative programs for parents and children, including, social work and psychological services; early identification programs; school-based child care for the children of secondary-school students; child-parent resource centres; formal and informal parent education programs; adult literacy programs, breakfast and lunch programs; sex-abuse prevention programs; suicide prevention programs; and development of 'trauma teams'.

Lists objections by the Ontario Public School Boards' Association (OPSBA) to the government's introduction of Bills 12 and 13 on December 4, 1990. Bill 12 is the Education Amendment Act (Miscellaneous) 1990 and Bill 13 is the Ottawa-Carleton French Language School Board Amendment Act, 1990. These Bills are intended to effect major changes in a number of highly contentious areas relating to local governance of education. Given the commitment of the Government to public consultation, the Government's stated intent to rush these Bills through to become law in only 16 days is inexplicable to OPSBA. Covers: separate school board extension by purchase of service; manner of establishment of additional French-language school boards; determination of school board composition; Bills 12 and 13 proposed timelines; and calculation of proportionality.

The Ontario Public School Boards' Association (OPSBA) notes that the climate of uncertainty, apprehension, and frustration concerning copyright is undermining the quality of education. Getting permission to use copyrighted material in advance of use is often impossible or extremely inconvenient, and students are deprived of using the most effective article, film, or piece of music. OPSBA recognizes the interests and rights of copyright owners and creators, but suggests that the education sector also has rights as copyright users. It supports Bill S-8, subject to an amendment dealing with works performed in public, and urges the government to proceed quickly with the 2nd phase of changes to the Copyright Act.

The Ontario Public School Boards' Association (OPSBA) stresses that since boards are already responsive to requests for heritage language programs, it is unnecessary for them to be mandated. It recommends that they continue to be optional, offered on a continuing education basis. OPSBA notes that while ministry proposals for inservice training, curriculum development, and research into heritage language are generally positive steps, adequate funding must be provided. It supports ministry initiatives in the area of learning materials development, but suggests that further information is required regarding the setting of criteria for Ontario's heritage language program. It recommends that the Ministry advisory committee's mandate be extended to fulfil this function.

Study to assess the scope of the alcohol and drug abuse problem and to assist in the development of appropriate preventive and remedial actions. Three surveys were conducted, the largest of which was a telephone survey of over 2,000 people in the Alberta workforce including some unemployed. As well, a mail survey of 325 employers and of 43 unions was conducted. This summary report defines the dimensions of the substance abuse problem; examines the prevalence of both alcohol and drug use and the various occupational and demographic factors associated with higher levels of use; assesses the personal problems some workers attributed to their own substance use; focuses on the effects of substance use by examining the effect of substance use on occupational health, safety and productivity, examines how co-workers, supervisors, managers, and unions respond to substance use among the work force, including such workplace policies as assistance programs; and highlights suggestions for action to address the issues of substance use in the workplace.

A number of researchers have suggested that hydrologic conditions can play a major role in controlling the distribution and/or density of invertebrate populations in streams. This report presents the results of sampling of the fauna at two North Island, New Zealand streams. Sampling was conducted at each of four stations and simple hydrologic measurements (tractive force at bankfull depth, slope and median substrate diameters) were made to investigate the potential usefulness of aquatic invertebrates as indicators of stream substrate stability. Invertebrate densities were correlated with hydrological parameters and two derived indices of substrate stability.

Investigates specific support strategies for the successful placement of students in grades according to their ages, and examines this practice in North York, making recommendations for refinement. Placement must be a thoughtful, planned, and individualized process if it is to help students succeed. For exceptional placement, a framework within which these exceptions are best served is offered, but for most students this is a sound educational practice. The report underlines the importance of teachers and the crucial link between effective teaching and teacher recognition and satisfaction, and relates the findings from studies of effective teaching practices to effective strategies outlined by teachers. Support strategies to enhance placed students' learning are specific strategies that teachers use to enhance the learning of all students. A parallel is evident between strategies shown to improve student achievement and strategies used to improve students' performance. The author identifies 11 effective teaching strategies: planning structured sessions, skilful classroom management, content emphasis, focusing, assessment and record keeping, high expectations, creating a positive learning environment, instructional cues to increase time on task, teaching thinking as a basic skill, parental involvement, and reflection on teaching practices. It is important to provide the teacher with a supportive workplace to ensure effective change and recommends the creation of a professional teacher culture. Appendices include the principal survey, teacher survey, a review of related literature, and notes on evaluation.

The Lachmach River Project, set up in 1987, is part of the Coho Salmon Research Program, initiated in response to the Canada-U.S. Pacific Salmon Treaty. The program obtains information on the biology and productivity of coho salmon stocks in B.C. The Lachmach River is 23 km east of Prince Rupert, at the head of Work Channel. This report presents data from fence operations, coho smolt trapping and sampling, and coded wire tagging operations conducted in the spring of 1990. Fish were sorted by species, enumerated, sampled and checked for marks.

Summary of written responses to 'New directions in pesticide management', Pesticide Management Program five-year strategic plan

by D.E. Cronin. Victoria : Ministry of Environment, Lands and Parks, Pesticide Management Branch, 1992. 18 p.
MICROLOG 92-06623 1 fiche

In August 1991, a 12-page document on new directions in pesticide management was mailed to 2,500 people who were recognized as having an interest in decisions on pesticide management. In addition, a large number of copies were circulated by each of the BC Environment regional offices. An introductory letter requested written comments about the five-year plan and a response form was included asking for broad impressions and areas which required more or less emphasis. A total of 135 written responses were received. This document summarizes the written comments received on the strategic plan, the mission statement and principles, the three strategic objectives, and the pesticide management advisory committee.

This report summarizes occurrences reported during the 1990 calendar year and provides comparisons to previous years for the identification of significant trends. The report describes general types of occurrences and ministry records and gives summaries. A detailed description of spills is given, includes types of materials spilled, to what medium, quantities, the environmental impact, cleanup action, in what sector and sources, and the cause and reason for the spill. Spills to the Great Lakes and their inter-connecting channels are also included. Also included are regional and sector breakdowns, and a listing of complaints by type and sector.

Summary-final report, 1989-92

Miramichi River Environmental Assessment Committee (N.B.). New Castle, N.B. : The Committee, 1992. iii, 157 p. : ill. MICROLOG 92-06526 3 fiche

In 1988, Miramichi Pulp and Paper Inc. completed an expansion at their mill situated south of Newcastle, New Brunswick. There was significant public concern about the potential impact of such an expansion on the Miramichi River and questions were raised about the lack of an environmental impact assessment. A committee was formed in 1989 of concerned citizens, representatives of provincial and federal governments, and company representatives. This committee recommended a two-year study of the river to assess its health and that the committee remain in place to monitor the study. The Miramichi River Environmental Assessment Committee evolved from the earlier committee in April 1989. This summary report presents the results of the two-year study of the river, including background information; the problems; water, biota, and sediment analyses; the effects of dredging; the impact on Atlantic salmon and shellfish harvesting; government protocol and logistical problems; and proposed guidelines for the committee.

Summative evaluation of the 'Habitat' learning system

by Robert Steward Brown ; with the assistance of Dianna Davis [and] Tim Mischuk. Toronto : TVOntario, 1989. 46 p. : ill. Bibliogr. (Report ; no. 3 - 1989-90) ONTERIS: ON05397. MICROLOG 92-06390 1 fiche

Designed for junior-level students, the habitat learning system has 3 objectives: alert children to what scientists do, encourage an interactive role with animals, and instruct scientific principles relating to habitats. This evaluation of the Habitat Learning System focuses firstly on groups of teachers who were sent a copy of a guide and magazine (system consists of 20 programs, a teacher's guide, and a student magazine). They were tested with 2 representative programs 1 week later. 18 classes in 6 boards were selected for a field test. Teachers used the Learning System for 3 months in the spring of 1988. After pre- and post-tests, students participated in group discussion. Teachers completed a questionnaire on their experiences with Habitat. Results showed teachers liked the program though they thought more activities or suggestions would be useful. Students liked Habitat. Tests showed an increase in knowledge about animals. Since students already liked scientists, science attitudes were not altered. Short activities and exercises in Habitat print material were highly regarded. Problems using a VCR to locate segments reveals the importance of communicating with teachers before and during learning system development. Includes some suggestions for future research.

The Summative evaluation of the Science Quality Education Project (SQEP)

by Lynette Gillis ; with the assistance of Louise Glegg, June Larkin, and Moji Ojo. Toronto :

TVOntario, 1990. 49 p. Bibliogr. (Report ; no. 9 - 1990-91) ONTERIS: ON05742. MICROLOG 92-06382 1 fiche

Evaluation of TVOntario's Science Quality Education Project (SQEP), initiate in 1987 to promote the use of science programming and television as a teaching tool. Initially, 44 teachers in 36 schools in 4 school boards were trained. After their 2-year training, this "model" group became trainers of their colleagues, who in turn trained others. In 1990, telephone interviews were conducted with 62 teachers (37 first wave, 21 second wave, 4 third wave teachers). Background information was obtained from TVOntario and school board. SQEP was successful in changing teaching practices and attitudes. Over the 3-year period, the first wave continued to use television and TVOntario programming in their science teaching. The training enhanced their leadership skills and self esteem. Students were more interested and involved in science instruction, more critical of their TV viewing habits, and more likely to retain information from interactive television viewing. The first wave attributed this success to: release-time for training; the use of small working groups; a strong element of classroom practice and experimentation; ample time for professional development; and strong leadership. The major weakness was the lack of a continuous ripple effect. Typically, the effects spread from the model teacher to a small group of colleagues in the same school, diminishing with each successive wave. While second wave teachers claimed to be more aware of television resources and to use them more often, they did not display the enthusiasm or depth of commitment of first wave teachers. 11 recommendations are made, among them: teachers should train others once they themselves have been trained; a range of training methods should be considered, not just the extremes of peer coaching and workshops; and a teacher training resource package would be useful.

Reforestation of burned and cut-over areas in sub-boreal and boreal forests of North America has been hampered by a number of factors, including a generally short planting season and a restricted labour supply. These problems have stimulated research across Canada and the U.S. aimed at developing methods to permit the successful planting and establishment of seedlings during the entire period when areas scheduled for regeneration were free of snow or frozen soils. This report presents a brief review of the North American literature and discusses the results of recent attempts to extend the planting periods in B.C. throughout the snow-free season.

A simple method was developed for the direct coupling of supercritical fluid extractions (SFE) with a high resolution gas chromatograph equipped with an electron capture detector. SFE conditions were investigated for polychlorinated biphenyls from sediments in terms of mobile phase, entrainer, pressure, temperature and mass-flow optimization. The dynamic and static extractions were compared. Determination of PCBs was tested on certified sediment from the National Water Research Institute.

Supercritical fluids are finding acceptance as solvation media in environmental analytical chemistry. The most difficult matrix for determination of polychlorinated dibenzo-p-dioxins (PCDDs) and chlorinated dibenzofurans (PCDFs) is fly ash, formed during combustion of municipal garbage. This paper reports experimental results for quantifying PCDDs in fly ash samples, treated with formic acid or hydrochloric acid prior to the supercritical fluid extraction. A comparison between dynamic leaching and static modes of extraction is also discussed.

Based on forecasted increases in electricity demand, several utilities will be faced with capacity shortages within the next decade. A study was therefore commissioned to assess the potential for peak load reduction through residential solar water heating. The study will analyze both existing and innovative solar system designs according to the criteria of peak reduction capacity, reductions in energy consumption at different utility demand levels, impact on load factor, and the ability to supply hot water under typical and extreme load conditions. This report details the findings of the first phase of the study, which is limited to the evaluation of single family, residential systems in Ontario, Quebec and N.S. The study designed solar assisted domestic water heating systems which are specifically geared to peak load reduction; evaluated the effects of each system on local utility peak loads, load factors, energy consumption levels, and consumer satisfaction; and assessed each system's potential for a range of geographic locations and market penetration levels.

This report presents results of geological, geophysical and engineering studies carried out by Newfoundland and Labrador Hydro on the feasibility of installing high-voltage direct-current (HVDC) submarine cables beneath the Strait of Belle Isle to transmit hydroelectric power from Labrador to the Island of Newfoundland. These studies are part of a much larger program to evaluate the potential for developing hydroelectric power at the Gull Island site on the lower Churchill River in Labrador for transmission to the Island of Newfoundland. Results of most of the work in the Strait of Belle Isle were presented in the form of contract reports to Newfoundland and Labrador Hydro between 1973 and 1984 but because the reports were proprietary, many reports duplicate information and others make use of work which is not sourced. This report clarifies as much as possible of the data, particularly the nomenclature of bedrock units and terminology of surficial geological features. New interpretations are given on the nomenclature of bedrock units and their distribution, and details are added to the knowledge of glacial history of the Strait based on the surficial geology and the existence of exposed suites of ribbed moraines.

La surpêche des stocks qui chevauchent la zone de 200 milles est l'un des principaux facteurs à l'origine du malaise qui sévit actuellement dans le secteur des pêches de l'Atlantique, malaise qui se traduit par une immobilisation des bateaux au quai, des fermetures d'usines de transformation du poisson ou une réduction considérable de l'activité dans le domaine de la pêche. Ce document se penche précisément sur la surpêche à l'extérieur de la zone de 200 milles de la côte Atlantique.

The Canadian Environmental Protection Act (CEPA) requires the assessment of chemicals that are new to Canada, based upon the set of data provided by the manufacturer or importer on their physical, chemical, and toxicity properties and their intended use patterns. Part of the assessment process may use computer models to estimate the nature and extent of human exposure that will result from commercial use of these chemicals. As no models suitable for immediate implementation are available within the federal government, this report reviews 15 models and modelling approaches in use or being developed in other jurisdictions and discusses their strengths and deficiencies.

This report presents the results of a survey undertaken on behalf of the Task Force. The survey was designed to assess the views of all federally sentenced women in prison about their experiences of imprisonment, and the kinds of programmes and services they feel they need, and to provide a broader profile of the population than that routinely available. The experiences of aboriginal women, those in provincial prisons, and those serving long sentences were of particular concern. The survey was based on interviews with all women at the Prison for Women in Kingston and all those serving federal sentences under Exchange of Service Agreements in provincial prisons. A total of 170 women took part in the interviews between August and November 1989.

This study was designed to gather information on the perceptions, attitudes, knowledge, history, and interest of private landowners in establishing management programs on their forested acreage, or in reforestation of their lands. Properties were divided into those with more than 40 acres of potentially valuable forest (quality woodlots) and those with less than 40 acres (small or limited woodlots). Four widely separated municipalities were surveyed. A total of 374 questionnaires were sent to owners of quality woodlots, with 87 usable returns, and a total of 743 questionnaires were sent to owners with small woodlots with a return of 210.

Survey of moisture levels in attics : final report

Buchan, Lawton, Parent Ltd. Ottawa : Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, Research Division, 1991. iv, 112 p. : ill.

A survey of 20 residential buildings was conducted to observe the impact of ventilation strategies on moisture accumulation in attics, to record attic lumber moisture content levels over one year, and to assess the ventilation characteristics of the attics in order to account for the recorded moisture levels. The sample homes represented a range of ages, construction types, and attic venting formats, with five of them located in a coastal climate. Two test protocols, developed specifically for this project, were applied to the sample. The test protocols determined attic airtightness and attic air change rates. Moisture monitoring equipment was installed in each attic and periodic measurements were taken for one year. This report presents the findings of the survey and offers an assessment of the two test procedures used.

Precommercial thinning is a spacing operation intended to increase the proportion of preferred species and shorten the time to operability of dense naturally regenerated stands. In 1988, a survey was begun to assess the condition of a stand precommercially thinned prior to 1984. Fifty three stands, treated between 1966 and 1983, were selected from a comprehensive list to ensure an even distribution by region and year thinned. Spruce and fir precommercial thinnings, representing a range of spacing regimes, were given priority for selection. Regeneration was tallied by species, height class, and origin. All other stand trees, living or dead, were measured at breast height for diameter in centimetres and rated as to their health, vigour, and dominance. Live trees were classified as either crop, if they were expected to be merchantable at time of harvest, or suppressed, if they were not. An estimate of the number of trees required to fill holes in the canopy was determined by considering average tree spacing and crown size. These trees were classified as missing and represented the estimated number of average crop trees required to bring the plot stocking to 100%.

During 1990 and 1991, a survey of site preparation operations was conducted at 14 different locations representing a range of site and slash conditions to assess the effectiveness and productivity of four alternate site preparation methods (corridor raking, dragging with anchor chains and shark-fin barrels, crushing using loaded forwarders, and crushing with rollers and choppers) in an operational setting. This report gives the results of the four different methods.

Playgreen and Kiskittogisu lakes precede the outflow of Lake Winnipeg into the Nelson River, an area of northern Manitoba which has seen considerable hydroelectric development. This study compared the pre- and post-Lake Winnipeg regulation status of benthic invertebrates in the two lakes. Pre-development fisheries and benthic surveys of the lakes were carried out in 1971, with Playgreen Lake divided into three areas and Kiskittogisu Lake divided into two areas. Benthic invertebrates were sampled at key and transect stations used for collecting fish and a total of 173 Ponar grab samples were taken. Playgreen Lake was resurveyed in July 1987 and 1989, and Kiskittogisu Lake was resurveyed in July 1989 only. Thirty-three stations were sampled in Playgreen Lake and 12 stations were sampled in Kiskittogisu Lake.

A Symposium on Advanced Oxidation Processes for the Treatment of Contaminated Water and Air : proceedings

Advanced Oxidation Processes for the Treatment of Contaminated Water and Air. Symposium (1990 : Toronto, Ont.). Burlington, Ont. : Environment Canada, Conservation and Protection, Wastewater Technology Centre, 1991. 298 p. : ill. Bibliogr. MICROLOG 92-00355 4 fiche

Commonly used treatment methods for chemical contamination of groundwater and industrial wastewaters is not always effective and some technologies, such as in situ soil venting and air stripping, create an adverse secondary environmental impact, since the contaminants are simply transferred from soil to air. Advanced oxidation processes (AOPs) are promising alternatives for the treatment of hydrocarbons (halogenated and non-halogenated) and other organic chemicals found in contaminated water and in off-gases produced by other treatment technologies. This symposium discussed state-of-the-art and emerging technologies in the field; examined case studies that have successfully demonstrated, at bench-scale, pilot-scale, and full-scale levels, the use of AOPs for the removal of organics from water and air; and discussed current and pending R&D studies. The document presents the papers given at the symposium, covering the need for AOP; theory, chemistry and kinetics; product development and emerging technologies; and current state-of-the-art field applications and case studies.

About 250 climatological studies with direct application to the province of Alberta, produced from 1975-86, were selected. From these, the results and progress in a number of areas of specialization are synthesized. The studies are categorized as physical climatology relating to solar radiation, precipitation, chinooks, lightning, and wind; applied climatology relating to agriculture, forestry, water resources, urban climatology and air pollution, and recreation and tourism; and climate change and variability.

Les tables des marées fournissent l'heure et la hauteur prédites de la pleine mer et de la basse mer correspondant aux mouvements verticaux de la marée. L'heure et la hauteur de toutes les pleines et basses mers quotidiennes aux 'ports de référence' sont prédites et présentées dans les tables quotidiennes. Dans certains ports de référence où le comportement de la marée est complexe et non directement indiqué par les tables quotidiennes, la marée est aussi présentée sous forme analogique par des calendriers graphiques. Finalement, l'heure et la hauteur de la pleine mer et de la basse mer aux 'ports secondaires' sont présentées sous forme de tableaux donnant les écarts par rapport à un port de référence. Pour leur part, les tables des courants donnent l'heure prédite de l'étalement de même que l'heure et la vitesse du courant maximum liées au mouvement horizontal de la marée. Les heures de l'étalement et du courant maximum ainsi que la vitesse du courant maximum aux stations de référence des courants sont prédites et présentées sous forme de tables quotidiennes. Les heures de l'étalement et du courant maximum aux stations de courant secondaires sont présentées sous forme de tableaux comme différences de temps par rapport à une station de référence.

A Tabu Search procedure for multicommodity location/allocation with balancing requirements

A Tabu Search heuristic is proposed for the location/allocation problem with balancing requirements. This problem typically arises in the context of the medium term management of a fleet of containers of multiple types, where container depots have to be selected, the assignment of customers to depots has to be established for each type of container, and the interdepot container traffic has to be planned to account for differences in supplies and demands in various zones of the geographical territory served by a container shipping company. It is modeled as a mixed integer program, which combines zero-one location variables and a multicommodity network flow structure. Extensive computational results on a set of benchmark problems and comparisons with an efficient dual ascent procedure are reported.

A series of tests of four offshore skimmers (Framo ACW-400, GT-185, Walosep W-2, Heavy Oil Skimmer) were conducted in a large wave basin (120m x 60m x 3m) during the fall of 1989. Each skimmer was tested with each of IPL Sweet, a conventional crude oil, Terra Nova C-09, a waxy crude oil from the Grand Banks, and Bunker C. Each test involved 4-6 hours of skimming during which the recovered oil was recycled to the basin thus allowing evaluation of the skimmers with weathered and emulsified oils. Part of each test was conducted in waves having a 4-second period and heights varying from 0.4-0.8m. Near the end of the selected tests, the additive Elastol was applied to the oil and its effect on recovery parameters evaluated. This report provides the results of the tests.

Northern Radar Systems Ltd. (NRSL) is currently developing a ground wave over-the-horizon high frequency (HF) radar installation at Cape Race, Newfoundland to detect icebergs and ships. For radar signals directed at grazing incidence, the primary component of the back-scatter is attributed to ocean waves having a wavelength half that of the radar wavelength, leading to scattering. Scattering also occurs with targets such as ships and icebergs. This paper attempts to reduce ocean clutter to improve target detection through the use of a model which uses discrete sinusoids, whose phase velocities vary in time in a non-random way, as some function of the ocean spectra.

L'industrie des communications téléphoniques a longtemps été considérée comme une industrie monopoliste de fait, c'est-à-dire qu'en raison de l'étendue du marché, les coûts moyens à long terme sont réduits à une échelle telle qu'une seule entreprise peut exister. Etant donné que les tarifs téléphoniques artificiellement élevés sont aussi nuisibles que les coûts de la main-d'oeuvre ou les coûts en capital artificiellement élevés, les sociétés canadiennes cherchent des moyens d'éviter ou de compenser ce désavantage. Dans ce document, on examine la fin du monopole de fait dans le domaine des télécommunications, ainsi que ses effets réels aux États-Unis et ses effets probables au Canada.

Ce document se penche sur le domaine des télécommunications au Canada. Les principaux objectifs de ce document sont d'examiner les stratégies des grandes entreprises canadiennes de télécommunications en matière de technologie et de comparer la performance du Canada sur le plan de la R-D à celle de ses principaux concurrents commerciaux, en soulignant les grandes raisons des différences observées, le cas échéant, et l'incidence de ces écarts sur la compétitivité du Canada dans ce secteur. Il examine particulièrement les points suivants: le secteur mondial des télécommunications; le secteur canadien des télécommunications; et, les défis et les débouchés du secteur canadien des télécommunications.

A recently developed photodetector circuit exploits the exponential voltage-to-current characteristic of a MOSFET operated in the subthreshold region to achieve a logarithmic steady state response. This paper analyzes the temperature dependence of the circuit operation and presents experimental data which is generally consistent with the model. A test circuit which would facilitate accurate measurements at low illumination levels is proposed.

Two high temperature, reservoir steady state relative permeability tests were conducted using supplied frozen preserved core material from the 289.84-292.95 metre interval of Petro-Canada Hangingstone area well 1-34-84-11 W4M. The tests were performed isothermally at a temperature of 200C with 2,000 kPag backpressure and 6,200 kPag overburden pressure. Synthetic produced water and cleaned Hangingstone bitumen were utilized for the steady state displacement tests. Oil-water steady state relative permeability curves were generated in both the imbibition and drainage directions in both tests to observe potential relative permeability hysteresis effects. This report summarizes the results.

The Tensile strength of Cold Spring Quarry granite determined by using four different test procedures

by B. Gorski. Ottawa : Canada Centre for Mineral and Energy Technology, Mining Research Laboratories, 1991. iii, 11 p. : ill. Bibliogr. (Report ; MRL 91-040(TR)) MICROLOG 92-01191 1 fiche

The CANMET laboratory developed a simple tensile apparatus to perform tensile strength tests on rock specimens. The apparatus is unique in that it is designed to fit in a compression press having no tension capabilities. The compression of the apparatus in the press transmits direct tension in the rock specimen. The apparatus can be installed in a triaxial chamber, and by suitably jacketing the specimen, the specimen may be failed in tension in confined conditions. A test program was undertaken to assess the validity of tensile strength test results determined on granite rock specimens using the new test apparatus. Test results were compared with Brazilian, triaxial extension, and double-cored extension tests. This report presents the test results, as well as describing the design and operation of the tensile apparatus.

The second maxilla was taken for estimation of the molting stages and the carapace width and chela height of each individual was measured. To examine the relationship between carapace width and chela height, the crabs were divided into those with a relatively large chela height (large-clawed crab), and those with a relatively small chela height (small-clawed crab).

The procedure and results of a computerized test to identify syllabic recognition and reversal problems. Field tested in 6 Kativik School Board schools, the test allowed students to respond to 40 sets of matching and non-matching syllabics in a timed environment. A version of this test was used to determine young students prereading readiness, however, since students were not tested until November the value of the test was limited. In addition, results recorded were lost due to programming/hardware incompatibility. Those problems were offset by anecdotal comments attesting to the user friendliness of the test. Results showed that by November the students with no learning deficits were able to complete the test without difficulty. Possible alternatives to the computer-based test are also presented. Air quality testing was conducted in 16 homes in Weyakwin, 8 homes in Green Lake, and 4 suites in Pinehouse because of questions regarding the wood preservative treatments used in the construction of the homes or applied post-construction. Tests were performed to identify indoor air concentrations of pentachlorophenol (PCP), creosote, and other hydrocarbons. Airtightness testing and ventilation rate measurements were also carried out in a number of the homes so as to quantify the amount of ventilation and compare this with national standards. Several samples of wood products were extracted from the homes which had been previously identified as having either creosote or pentachlorophenol treated materials. The source of crossarms, transmission line spars, and poles for the utility companies has traditionally been solidly sawn Douglas fir, but in the last 10 years this source has become increasingly precarious, resulting in higher prices, extended delivery, and in some cases nonavailability. In addition, there is no accepted standard for performance required, although a survey of users established common expectations. This report presents the results of a project to develop a product and a manufacturing standard to meet the needs of, and gain acceptance from, the utility companies. This project developed a qualitative assessment of the existing inventory of the system configuration and spillage frequency of residential woodburning systems; defined the system characteristics and external conditions which tend to result in spillage; proposed remedial measures to reduce the likelihood of spillage and tested these measures through field testing and monitoring, and tried to understand how user practices contribute to spillage events, proposing alternative practices which would lead to fewer events. The qualitative assessment involved a national survey/inspection of randomly selected wood heated houses and the analysis of the results. System characteristics and conditions which could be expected to result in spillage were defined through laboratory testing of sample appliance types, field testing of targeted systems and their correlation with the survey/inspection types. Proposed remedial measures were developed based on the survey/inspection, field testing and laboratory test results. After field monitoring of selected systems to establish as-found performance, the remedial measures were carried out and the systems were again monitored to identify any changes in performance. • CA EV PL SC

Theory of coteries -- Rev.

by T. Ibaraki and T. Kameda. Burnaby, B.C. : Simon Fraser University, Centre for Systems Science ; Laboratory for Computer and Communications Research, 1991. 32 p. Bibliogr.

A coterie consists of subsets of an underlying set such that any pair of subsets has at least one element in common. Nondominated coterie are of particular interest, since they are optimal in some sense. By assigning a boolean variable to each element in the ground set, a coterie is represented by a boolean function of these variables. This paper characterizes the nondominated coterie as exactly as those that can be represented by positive, self-dual functions. In this boolean framework, it is proven that any function representing a non-dominated coterie can be composed from copies of the 3-majority function, and its composition is representable as a binary tree. The paper also shows that the composition of nondominated coterie proposed by Agrawal and El Abbadi is a special case of the above tree composition, and that the composition proposed by Nielsen and Mizuno is closely related to the classical Ashenhurst decomposition of boolean functions. A number of other results are also obtained. BC PR PS SC

Thermal resistance values of some protective clothing ensembles (U)

by B. Cain. Ottawa : Defence Research Establishment Ottawa, 1991. vi, 10 p. Bibliogr. (Technical note ; no. 91-24)
MICROLOG 92-02442 1 fiche

The war with Iraq at the beginning of 1991 sparked renewed interest in the development of new chemical protective garments for the armed forces. The military is particularly interested in clothing which provides adequate chemical protection without the current high heat stress experienced with the nuclear, biological, and chemical (NBC) protective ensembles worn at high work rates. This report describes calculations and measurements of the thermal resistance values of some protective NBC ensembles, including the current Canadian forces NBC ensemble and an experimental, vapour-protective garment developed at Defence Research Establishment Ottawa which is called the Interim suit. Calculations are based on simple heat transfer models, physical material properties, and some experimental observations. Measurements were made on a thermal manikin in still air and at two wind speeds.

The purpose of this paper is to provide a background for further work by identifying the diverse strands of economic analysis that have important bearing on the issue of intergenerational equity. It addresses the following questions: first, what should be the division of economic well-being between this and future generations; second, how do we calculate actual changes over time in economic well-being; third, what are the processes by which this generation affects the well-being of future generations; and fourth, what is the appropriate role for government?

This paper brings together two related but distinct issues in the analysis of culture and values in Canada and the United States. The first of these is Lipset's well-known thesis on the differences in national character and belief systems between Canadians and Americans. The second issue is the purported existence of distinct regional cultures within both countries. Using national sample survey data, it assesses the extent of both cross-national and regional differences on a range of attitudes and perceptions.

A new acoustic site-surveying technique is being researched based on the Acoustic Sub-seabed Interrogator (ASI) concept which involves very precise on-site imaging of near surface sediment and the statistical estimation of a soil's homogeneity. A shallow water prototype probe was developed to further the ideas of an ASI and to establish the limitations inherent in this technique. The prototype rests on the seabed during the investigation and is controlled remotely from a supporting vessel. This paper describes the prototype and its control system, outlines the operational and investigative procedures, and displays data from a recent field test.

The Fort Frances-Rainy River area is underlain by Archean supracrustal rocks which have received minimal exploration activity in the past because of their thick cover of glacial overburden. This report summarizes the results of a drift sampling program in the area in which approximately 600 samples of till and glaciofluvial sand were obtained from 71 continuously cored sonic boreholes, 44 backhoe trenches, and 165 hand-dug test pits. Samples were analyzed to determine matrix grain size and carbonate content; pebble size, shape and lithology; mineralogy of the less than 2 mm non-magnetic heavy mineral concentrate; and gold and native copper content, which includes an analysis of grain size and shape. Geochemical analyses were performed on the silt and clay fraction (less than 63 µm) of all till samples as well as on the less than 2 mm magnetic and non-magnetic heavy mineral concentrates of till and glaciofluvial sand samples. The report presents the data obtained, summarized in datasheets which treat each sonic borehole individually and the surface samples as a group.

Time domain analysis of ocean clutter in high frequency radar

High frequency (HF) radar has the unique potential for over-the horizon detection of ocean surface targets. However, ocean waves are also strong reflectors for HF radar and this high clutter level has limited its application for target detection. This paper describes further detailed investigations of the time-varying behaviour of the ocean clutter and shows that the clutter can be modelled by two narrowband signals, with time-carrying frequencies, centred around the two 'Bragg' frequencies. It also describes how, in the presence of a target signal, simple time-domain processing may be used to selectively suppress the dominant clutter signals.

The effectiveness of Gibberellin A4/7 (GA4/7) application on cone-bud production is often enhanced when applied in conjunction with heat treatment, root pruning, or water stress. However, optimal duration of weekly spraying is not well-defined, although 4-6 weeks has been recommended. This study defined the optimal duration of GA4/7 applications for cone production, and examined the effectiveness of its application in low concentrations on the efficiency of cone production. Potted 5-year-old grafts of black spruce growing in either a heated greenhouse or an outdoor holding area were sprayed weekly at 200 mg/L GA4/7 for various durations and timings. The application began 1-6 weeks after vegetative bud break and continued until the end of lateral shoot elongation. Spraying ended at the same time for all treatments, about 1 week before leaf primordial differentiation on the shoot apices. This report gives the results of the spraying.

The Tire Talk Project was initiated in September 1991 in response to a need for improved communication between all involved with the recycling of scrap tires. A team was assembled to tour the province and conduct presentations to local governments, tire generators, and the public. MICROLOG 92-04554 1 fiche

The Lake Winnipeg regulation and Churchill River diversion projects had major physical and biological effects on the regional environment, and major social and economic effects on local residents, particularly those of the Native communities that traditionally depended on the waterways for livelihood and travel. This report provides a basis for future social impact assessment by outlining the process by which socio-economic effects (particularly those related to resource harvesting) can be ascertained and monitored; assessing the utility of existing data sources for that purpose and identifying additional data requirements; and making some preliminary observations on resource harvesting impacts. This report outlines a model of resource harvesting, particularly the fishery, as a socio-economic system in northern Native communities. From this model are derived significant variables and measurable impact indicators. Existing data from institutional and literature sources are assessed for their suitability as impact indicators on the domestic harvesting of country food, commercial fishing, and trapping.

This study evaluated a plate flocculator/plate separator technique followed by a dual media filter, a high rate upflow clarifier followed by a multi-media downflow filter, and a standard method using mechanical flocculation and a plate separator followed by dual media filtration. Tests in which each system treated water from OC-2C from Gull Lake were carried out from January to March. Various coagulants and coagulant aid (organic and inorganic) were assessed on each of the process systems to optimize the chemical and dosages required. Turbidity and colour (raw, pre-filtration, filtered), alkalinity, hardness, pH, aluminum residual, headloss, and length of filter run were monitored.

Trajectories and stability of trailing vortices very near the ground

by A.M. Drummond, R. Onno and B. Panneton. Ottawa : National Research Council Canada, Institute for Aerospace Research, 1991. vii, 50 p. : ill. Bibliogr. (Aeronautical note : IAR-AN-74) MICROLOG 92-04509 1 fiche (Available on fiche only)

A research program on agricultural use of aerial spraying was conducted during the summer and fall of 1989 using a set of experiments to assess the roles of wing tip vortices and atmospheric turbulence on the downwind dispersion of spray droplets. The parameters on the problem, such as spray nozzles, terrain, and aircraft height were chosen to simulate current practices in agriculture. To support this research, a new spray deposit analysis system was developed, a new second generation sonic anemometer was created, and a new video system was installed in the helicopter. This report discusses the trajectories of the trailing vortices and their stability along with a measurement of the aircraft speed and altitude for each experiment.

Study to provide an estimate of the unit costs of transfer station facilities and operations.
The typical design throughput of the transfer station is assumed to be 20,000 tonnes per year and the station is either enclosed or includes a joint recycling operation. All costs are given in 1990 dollars using a capital amortization period of 15 years and a 12 percent interest rate. Costs of facilities and equipment were acquired from manufacturers and distributors serving N.B. It is assumed that most of the residential wastes will be collected curbside by collection vehicles, although small vehicle drop-off bays are provided. Six common recyclable waste items (glass, aluminum cans, plastics, newsprint, fine paper, cardboard) are assumed for the recycling operation and their proportions are based on the Atlantic Region sample of an Environment Canada 1979 report.

Many equipment problems being experienced by customers result from the incompatibility between the quality of power existing at the point of utilization and the power requirements of the utilization equipment. Problems will occur if the disturbance levels exceed the equipment tolerance levels, therefore the solution is to provide equipment with adequate tolerance levels or to provide suitable protective equipment. Before these equipment requirements can be established, it is necessary to know the severity of the disturbances at the customer facility. This report gives the results of measurements made by a BMI 4800 at one residential site, describes the characteristics of the transients measured in the residential household, and describes problems with the BMI 4800 which precluded its use in other commercial and industrial sites.

taking into account the outlook for economic growth and announced plans for airline industry operations. The report presents forecasts of the level of direct aviation activity from 1989-98 and from 1998-2003, defined by such indicators of traffic volumes as enplaned and deplaned passengers; revenue passenger-kilometres; enplaned and deplaned cargo; itinerant aircraft movements; fleet of registered aircraft; licensed aviation personnel, and hours flown.
Background information is also included, discussing both the economy and trends in the

This study reviews the literature and investigates the transport of selected radiopharmaceuticals from the mother to the fetus, along with the distribution of these radiopharmaceuticals in both animals and human. The search emphasizes the placental transport of the drugs and the development of pharmacokinetic models that could describe this transport. An outline of the distribution and/or transport of several radio-pharmaceuticals is presented, followed by a description of the factors that regulate the transport. Pharmacokinetic models were designed on the available information in the open literature. The limitation of the literature is discussed and suggestions for future experimental investigations are made.

The Geological Survey of Canada has been involved with the calibration of ground and airborne gamma-ray spectrometers since it constructed the first calibration facility for airborne spectrometers in 1968. Recent analysis of the calibration data obtained from the GSC facilities at Uplands airport, Ottawa, showed that the calibration constants were poorly known because of uncertainties in the radioelement concentrations of the pads. To improve the Canadian calibration facilities for both ground and airborne gamma-ray spectrometers, small sets of transportable pads 1 m x 1 m x 30 cm and weighing about 675 kg were constructed specially for calibrating portable spectrometers in the summer of 1988. Because of problems of radon leakage and inhomogeneities in the pads, a new set of uranium pads was constructed in the summer of 1989. This paper describes the design and construction of these small transportable pads and shows how they can be used for the calibration of both ground and airborne gamma-ray spectrometers.

Sectoral task forces were set up to deal with agriculture and food, energy and minerals, forestry, manufacturing, transportation, urban development and commerce, and a native people's circle. Each of the task forces was to relate the principles of anticipation and prevention of environmental problems, the use of full cost accounting, informed decision-making which reflects environmental impacts and long-term goals, living off the interest and reserving natural capital, quality over quantity, and respect for nature and the rights of future generations to its subject. This document provides an overview of the transportation sector in Ontario, presents a vision of a sustainable industry, discusses economic constraints and opportunities, and proposes some strategic actions in getting to a sustainable transportation sector.

longitudinal perspective, to assess competing interpretations of these patterns, and to draw some implications for policy. It uses administrative data associated with the operation of the program that covers roughly the period 1971 to 1990. It organizes this data as a panel data set, by individual, in order to examine the extent and nature of repeat unemployment insurance use. It documents a great deal of repeat use and evaluates two competing interpretations.

TravElGuide : Ontario route guidance system concept

Toronto : Ministry of Transportation,
Transportation Technology and Energy
Branch, 1991. 10 p.
MICROLOG 92-00815 1 fiche

A variety of in-vehicle navigation and route guidance systems have been proposed, developed and demonstrated in the U.S., Japan, and Europe. Although the systems are sophisticated, attractive, and useful, they are also expensive. The Ontario Ministry of Transportation is actively pursuing the assessment and possible development of TravElGuide, a route guidance system that will offer most of the benefits of more advanced systems but at a much lower cost. The present concept of the system includes a portable device that provides advice to the driver, based on real-time traffic information, on the route to take from the current position to the destination. The system does not include an on-board navigation capability, but relies on the driver to act as the navigator, thus resulting in significant cost savings. This paper provides a brief overview of route guidance systems, describes the TravElGuide concept, and compares it against route guidance systems in operation or under development elsewhere.

The Fraser River drainage basin is one of the world's major salmonid systems and is the world's largest single river producer of sockeye salmon. Within the Fraser system, Quesnel Lake is one of the largest producers of sockeye salmon. Escapement to the lake varies on a four-year cycle. The samples collected during the cycle will contribute toward determining the carrying capacity of Quesnel
Lake and other comparable interior lakes.
This report presents the results of five years of pelagic fish stock information using mid-water trawls in Quesnel Lake. Each sample was measured and weighed and summary statistics were calculated and length frequencies plotted by survey and species.

Treatment of CANMET coprocessing residues in hydrogen and steam plasma : final report

by R.J. Munz and D. Berk. Montreal : McGill University, Office of Industrial Research, 1991. 2 v. : ill. Bibliogr. Filmed with: Preliminary economic evaluation of the treatment of CANMET residue by hydrogen plasma. CANMET contract: 23440-79223-01-SS. MICROLOG 92-06280 1 fiche

CANMET is developing a hybrid process for coal liquefaction and heavy oil hydrocracking, known as coprocessing, that uses finely ground coal particles mixed with heavy oil and hydrogenated under high temperature and pressure. The resulting products are distilled to obtain distillates and residues. The distillates are further hydrotreated to meet various product specifications. The disposal of residues from this process pose serious problems since they contain high levels of sulphur and ash, and thus are of little commercial value and are considered to be toxic waste. This study assessed thermal plasma processes as a way of treating coprocessing residues. The study examined the feasibility of recovering the catalyst in a useful form while at the same time producing commercially attractive gases such as acetylene and heavier gases from the residues. A miniature reactors system was developed and used in both batch and continuous forms and the results are described.

Treatment of screenings to improve the nutritional value for cattle and destroy weed seed viability

by Jack A. Kernan...et al. ; for the Weyburn

Inland Terminal Ltd. Regina : Saskatchewan Agriculture Development Fund, 1990. v, 45 p. : ill. Bibliogr. (SRC publication ; no. R-1550-2-E-90) ISSN 0829-9455 MICROLOG 92-06536 1 fiche

Most of the grain being produced in Saskatchewan is shipped directly from the elevators to the Lakehead where it is cleaned before it is exported. The residue from cleaning, called screenings, offers a potentially valuable source of protein and energy to the livestock feeding industry. Much of the screenings at the Lakehead are pelletized and then shipped back to the west for use in cattle rations, but this is expensive. One alternative is that being used by the Weyburn Inland Terminal, which cleans the grain and sells the screenings, divided into shrivelled and broken kernels of grain, wild oats, and refuse consisting of chaff and weed seeds other than wild oats. The terminal produces up to 3,500 tonnes of refuse screenings per year but there is a problem with the viability of weed seeds. This project examined the comparative nutritive values of screenings that were steam pelletized, left untreated, had undergone chemical treatment with ammonia, or were supplemented with urea. The nutritive value was determined both in the lab with in vitro organic matter digestibility, or by in vivo feeding trials with cattle and sheep. The study also compared the viability of weed seeds that had passed through the animals' digestive tracts in untreated and pelletized screenings, and observed the effects of chemical treatment with ammonia or urea on weed seed viability.

Treatment of uranium process raffinate at Key Lake Uranium Mines Ltd. for the recovery of nickel

by G.M. Ritcey, R. Molnar and E.W. Wong. Ottawa : Canada Centre for Mineral and Energy Technology, Mineral Sciences Laboratories, 1986. i, 22 p. : ill. (Report ; MSL 86-15(CR)) MICROLOG 92-02375 1 fiche

The processing of most uranium ores involves the leaching of the crushed and ground ore in a sulphuric acid medium together with an oxidant, which solubilizes the uranium as well as any base metals and some other elements which may be present. At the Key Lake operation in Saskatchewan, the ore contains substantial quantities of nickel, arsenic and iron which are solubilized along with the uranium. The quantity of nickel in solution is substantial and is considered to be a potentially valuable by-product. At the request of senior management in Key Lake Mining Corp. in February 1986, a project was carried out to determine whether a saleable nickel product could be recovered from the uranium process raffinate. Process routes considered included a solvent extraction purification treatment of the raffinate and a type of precipitation process. The bench studies were carried out during March-August 1986. This report describes the processes and the results.

Establishment of hardwood plantations on cutover areas are difficult because of excessive competition and browsing by deer, mice, and rabbits. Experiments in other areas with tree shelters has demonstrated their potential to reduce browsing and to help the young seedlings rise rapidly above the competition. This report describes the results from a test site located beside the Kent Road near Teahan's Corner, Albert County, New Brunswick. A number of tree shelters for testing on red oak were planted in early May 1986. Tree shelters were constructed from 4 ft x 8 ft sheets of 4 mm corrugated clear plastic and were placed over the seedling, supported by a wooden stake driven into the ground. Measurements of height growth were undertaken in 1988.

Parsing-generation of a unification-based grammar and inheritance in a semantic network are closely related. This paper shows this by introducing a restricted form of the tree unification grammar formalism and developing a hierarchy of the different concepts and structures used in parsing-generation with this formalism. This hierarchy is then expanded into an inheritance network that has a straightforward implementation in Prolog. The Prolog implementation of the network is then incorporated into a very simple parser-generator.

Trend analysis methodology for water quality time series

McLeod-Hipel and Assoc. Ltd. Toronto : Environment Ontario, Research and Technology Branch, Environmental Research, 1991. 358 p. : ill. Bibliogr. ISBN 0-7729-7544-2

MICROLOG 92-00127 4 fiche

This report presents a general trend analysis methodology for detecting and modelling trends in water quality time series observed in rivers and streams. The procedure is specifically designed for typically ill-behaved river quality series characterized by such features as non-normal positively skewed populations, irregularly spaced instantaneous observations, seasonal periodicities and covariable dependence. Specific graphical, parametric and nonparametric statistical techniques are utilized. Graphical methods include time series plots, robust regression smooths and box and whisker plots. Nonparametric techniques include tests based on Kendall's g rank correlation coefficient. An innovative procedure based on Spearman's partial rank correlation is introduced as a means of 'partialling out'. The methods are illustrated by application to a variety of fundamental water quality indicator variables observed in the Grand and Saugeen Rivers of southwestern Ontario.

This report discusses the results of a four-week flail trial undertaken in 1989 to determine the production ability of a chain-flail delimeter/debarker processing frozen small-diameter timber at a satellite location in central Alberta. An objective of the field trial was to maintain bark content at 1 percent or less on a green-weight basis. The delimbbed and debarked logs were chipped with a portable chipper and samples of the chips produced were analyzed for bark content, size distribution, and moisture content. The trial also included assessing the production of a ring debarker processing small-diameter frozen sawlogs at a sawmill, and the chipping of these frozen logs in the portable chipper. Delimbbed, small-diameter, lodgepole-pine, pulpwood logs, spruce-pine tops; western red cedar slabs and logs; and fire-filled, delimbbed, spruce-pine timber were also processed through the system. The report gives bark content, productivity, and cost information.

In trying to get the most from the annual harvest of trees, attention is beginning to focus on the development of methods and machines which favour increased utilization of the tree. One such approach entails the use of a portable chain flail to delimb and debark full trees at the forest roadside. To assess the effect of winter conditions on performance, a satellite chipping plant consisting of a chain flail close-coupled with a roadside chipper was the subject of field trials during February and March 1989 at Hinton, Alberta. The main components of the system were a Peterson-Pacific model 4800 chain-flail delimeter/debarker, and a Morbark Model 22RXL chipper. Analyses assessed the quality of the chips produced during the field trials for size distribution and bark content; determined the composition of the various residue streams; and ascertained whether or not the action of a chain flail affects pulp quality.

To better define the sources and significance of contaminants entering the Upper Great Lakes connecting channels, the relative contribution of Ontario tributaries which discharge to the St. Clair and Detroit Rivers and Lake St. Clair was assessed during 1984 and 1985. The study was conducted to fulfill a Ministry of the Environment commitment to the binational Upper Great Lakes Connecting Channels Study. The study evaluated water quality and sediment data from tributary mouths to identify potential industrial inputs and landfill or agricultural (pesticide or nutrient) impacts from rural, non-point sources on these connecting channels. More detailed discussions of study design and results are presented here, with specific recommendations for control programs based on the identification of potential sources. Additional sampling was conducted in 1986 in Turkey Creek and the Grand Marais Drain to determine the extent of PCB contamination and to track down any sources. During 1989, a study was conducted in Trafalld Creek to identify the source(s) of the hexachlorobenzene and other industrial organics detected during the 1984-85 study.

The proposed scheme for photovoltaic (PV) performance enhancement described in this report is tritium doping of conventional solar cells. Preliminary calculations suggest that the tritium beta radiation could increase the effective PV efficiency, indicating the potential to yield cheaper solar power than is possible using conventional PV cells. This report details recent experimental work in collaboration with the University of Toronto investigating the influence of simulated tritium doping on solar cell performance.

The Transportation Safety Board was established in 1989 to advance transportation safety in the marine, commodity pipeline, rail, and air modes of transport through conducting independent investigations and studies, identifying transportation safety deficiencies, and making recommendations designed to eliminate or reduce these deficiencies. This document presents a summary of facts and figures on occurrences reported by mariners under Canadian federal jurisdiction. The report gives a textual statistical overview, a presentation of analytical tables on occurrences for 1981-90, and appendices containing explanations, terminology, and a regional limits chart. Marine accidents include shipping accidents involving collisions, groundings, and strikings; and accidents aboard ship, including persons being caught or struck by cargo/machinery, falling overboard, and falling on deck or off the quay. Marine incidents include near-collisions, near groundings, cargo shift, and machinery failure. Data involving pleasure craft are not collected generally.

Describes TVOntario's first involvement in the seventh OISE biannual study "Public Attitudes Toward Education in Ontario." TVOntario added 6 questions to the survey to find out about viewing habits, interest in television courses, attitudes towards educational television, and attitudes towards using computers for learning. 43% of adult Ontarians reported watching TVOntario and/or La Chaîne française once a week or more. Since this is almost double the percentage of regular viewers reported in other research, possible reasons are suggested for the discrepancy. There was solid support for the value of educational television at home (86%) and in school (76%). 8% (560,000 adults) reported having "followed a course on educational television" at some time, and 42% 'would consider following a course on educational television.' A large majority felt that computers are valuable for learning.

To ascertain how TVOntario (TVO) has served native people and to document what was known about these services and their effectiveness, information was gathered through discussion with TVO staff from December 1, 1989 to January 22, 1990. TVO has made a major contribution to native broadcasting. There is substantial goodwill in the organization with regard to native needs, but a realistic appreciation that resources are limited and that priorities must be set daily. Methods need to be developed to better monitor TVO's response to native programming needs and the implementation of an associated program is timely. The demands on TVO, both as a broadcaster and as a supporter of native broadcasters, are increasing and starting to pose organizational challenges. In addition, there is a growing recognition of the importance of support for native people's social, cultural, and economic development.

In the event of a heat transport pipe rupture in a nuclear power plant, the high enthalpy coolant discharging from the ruptured pipe will flash into a two-phase jet with high momentum which may cause damage to containment. School registration figures for September 1988 show that students were registered in 363 public or separate, unilingual French, or mixed-language schools in Ontario. A brief overview examines the history of legislation concerning French-language instruction. The changes experienced by French-language schools between September 1988 and September 1989 are summarized, and the relations between schools and boards are described. A visual schema of French-language school structures lists schools according to type for the 11 different kinds of school situations. An inventory of school boards according to degree of linguistic isolation lists boards in ascending order of the proportion of students registered in French-language schools as compared to the total registrations in the respective boards. Also indicated is the proportion of the French-speaking population in the municipality or county in which the school board is located. These analyses suggest possible activities that TVOntario might develop (e.g., workshops on the use of educational television). The index makes clear which boards have experienced considerable change in linguistic composition between 1988 and 1989. 2 inventories list those boards that offer mother-tongue French instruction and the number of French mother-tongue students within each board, and the various boards that offer French-language instruction, indicating their size and the boards to which they belong.

Ultrafiltration field pilot testing for the treatment of produced water : final report

Steam simulated enhanced oil recovery (EOR) methods generate large volumes of an oil-water emulsion known as produced water. Produced water can be treated for recovery and reuse as boiler feed water using ultrafiltration as a potential alternative treatment method to such conventional technologies as skim tank, induced gas flotation and sand filter. This report gives the results of an on-site pilot test program which evaluated produced water ultrafiltration at two EOR in-situ operations in Western Canada. An explosion-proof Zenon ultrafiltration pilot system was installed and operated on site by Zenon personnel. Operating conditions were fixed at a module inlet pressure of 415 kPa, a feed flow rate of 105 L/min., and a temperature of 73°C. Most of the testing was conducted on produced water accepted from the skim tank influent stream, where the concentration of total oil varied within the approximate range of 100 mg/L to 2000 mg/L. Produced water characteristics were variable and often changed rapidly throughout most of the testing. Batch and continuous modes of equipment operation were investigated, using three different tubular cross-flow filtration membrane types, in an 8-tube in series configuration.

This State of the Environment report addresses global warming and the depletion of the atmosphere's ozone layer. It begins with an assessment of how the atmosphere naturally influences the earth's climate and how the climate has behaved in the past, including the natural concentrations of such greenhouse gases as water vapour, carbon dioxide, methane, and nitrous oxide. The report then considers the potential depletion of the upper atmosphere's protective ozone layer. Finally, it considers the linkages between the two issues, other atmospheric pollution problems, and human behaviour, and examines what is being done and must be done to respond, both nationally and internationally.

Studies of young people's occupational aspirations have typically focused on their correlates, but have not addressed the question of how aspirations may be modified as teenagers make the transition from school to the labour market. Given the distribution of jobs in the Canadian labour market, many of the high career aspirations of teenagers will not be satisfied. Data from a panel study of high school graduates in a large western Canadian city show how the experience of unemployment in the first year following graduation leads to a reduction in occupational aspirations. These findings are discussed in the context of the status attainment research literature, with reference to central sociological questions about the reproduction of social inequalities.

In 1991, a study evaluated the cost and management implications of container depot recovery systems in B.C. and developed scenarios for a variety of combinations of containers and beverage types. The provincial government was unable to get agreement from the various retailers involved, so the plan was dropped. After the change of government in 1991, the cost implications of a universal container recovery system were calculated and the proposed system was introduced to a number of focus groups for their suggestions. The proposed system assumed recovery managed by a public authority, all beverage containers (refillable, recyclable, non-recyclable) subject to deposit legislation, consumers able to return unlimited numbers of all container types for full refund to a network of 100-150 universal container depots, retailers required to accept for full legislated refund small quantities of refillable and recyclable containers for which they would receive a small fee, and deposits the same for all container types but refunds scaled to reflect the declining desirability of recyclable and non-recyclable container materials compared with refillables. This report contains the results of the financial evaluations compared with a revised option of return to depot only but with a larger number of depots than assumed in the earlier study.

Universality of A-mote graphs

This paper considers only finite loopless graphs and digraphs. The paper begins by remarking that the class of all bounded graphs does admit a universal graph, which is itself bounded. The paper then shows that if the class of bounded graphs is restricted by requiring that they be A-mote (for a fixed connected graph) a universal graph can also be found which is also A-mote, although not necessarily bounded.

A discussion of how the employer health tax and the provision of special funds for priority areas could help to offset the funding gap between minimal financial requirements and available funding for Ontario's universities. Given as the argument for this is the fact that net costs of implementing the employer health tax are greater for universities than for any other sector of the economy. The government, then, could commit itself to an ongoing arrangement whereby universities are compensated for the costs of the employer health tax, an amount that exceeds previous Ontario Health Insurance Plan (OHIP) payments. The provision of grants for specific priority areas of need as identified by stake holders would also relieve financial pressure. Concluding comments focus on the need for a major review of tuition fee policy and commend the introduction of excellence funds.

The Upper Cretaceous to Pleistocene succession of the Beaufort-Mackenzie Basin contains large volumes of oil and gas, making the basin a possible major producer of hydrocarbons in the future. To evaluate the economic potential and the environmental safeguards needed to safely produce the hydrocarbons, an understanding of the stratigraphy is a first-order necessity in any basin analysis. This report presents a regional stratigraphic scheme based upon the analysis of about 250 wells and many thousands of km of reflection seismic. Transgressive-regressive interpretations are presented and paleogeographic reconstructions are given for various time periods. The study area extends from the Alaska-Yukon border eastward to Banks Island and mainly underlies the Beaufort Sea.

Fusulinaceans were known from Carboniferous strata in the Sverdrup Basin since 1950 and were reported from the type area of the Canyon Fiord Formation on Ellesmere Island in 1941. Since then, they have been collected throughout the Sverdrup Basin and have enabled geologists to correlate Carboniferous successions in the basin with sequences elsewhere in the circum-Arctic and around the world. One of the objectives of the Geological Survey is to estimate the potential abundance and probable distribution of mineral and fuel resources in Canada, which requires extensive stratigraphic and paleontological data. This report presents information and interpretations that are of considerable assistance in further understanding the geology of the Arctic.

Upwards migration of iron and phosphorus compounds in anoxic sediments from a mesotrophic lake on the Precambrian Shield

Phosphorus (P) concentrations in lake sediments are usually three orders of magnitude higher than in the lake water. One fraction of this P is uninvolved in the biotic P cycle of the lake and another fraction is soluble as orthophosphate in the sediment pore water or can easily be dissolved when the sediment becomes reduced. This type of sediment P can be released into the overlying water under anoxic conditions and may then fertilize the lake water. The quantity of this biologically active P in the sediment may be correlated to certain iron (Fe) fractions. This study investigated several sediment fractions of P and Fe simultaneously during anoxic incubation, recording concentration changes of the overlying water and comparing them to the changes in the sediment. Sediment from Gravenhurst Bay of Lake Muskoka was selected for the studies. Large sediment cores were subsampled in the laboratory to generate replicates with different sediment depths and the shape of sediment Fe and P profiles, concentration changes and molar Fe-to-P ratios were used to test for upwards migration. Manganese (Mn) was also included in the analysis and was used to distinguish if the observed correlated release of Fe and P is likely due to the dissolution of hydrated iron oxides after reduction or simply due to sediment disturbances.

Canada and Australia are major producers in the world's uranium industry and principal competitors for the uranium export market. This study compares the impact of taxation on the economic viability and competitive position of uranium mining in the two countries, based on four types of uranium deposits which are of primary economic interest. Four hypothetical project models were designed for evaluation, based on these deposit types. The deposits are assumed to have been discovered and delineated, and are awaiting a mine development decision. Uranium mining project profiles were constructed for the four cases, synthesized from actual situations. Base case conditions include an expected uranium price of 30 dollars US per pound of U203, and 10 percent cost of capital. The project models were designed to give a good economic spread of before-tax returns, varying under base case conditions from marginally economic to highly profitable. Tax jurisdictions used are in Ontario, NWT, and Saskatchewan in Canada, and Northern Territory, South Australia, and Western Australia in Australia. Several taxation criteria are assessed in each case, including after-tax measures of investment incentive, discounted tax revenues, effective tax rates, intergovernmental tax shares, and comparative tax levels.

Used can electrolytic detinning

There is an increasing supply of tin plated steel available for recovery by the steel mills as a direct result of recycling programs such as the Ontario Blue Box program. Although the steel manufacturers currently accept the scrap as is, there are many contaminants which lower the quality of the re-melt, particularly tin. It is therefore necessary to develop a process which separates physical contaminants and removes metallic impurities in order to produce a high grade steel scrap which would have complete acceptance by steel mills. The feasibility of electrolytic detinning was investigated in laboratory studies using a rotating plating barrel. The effect of temperature, free alkali, and anodic and cathodic current densities were studied using prompt and post consumer scrap. The effect of agitation and scrap bulk density were also monitored. This led to recommendations for the operation of a pilot plant, which was designed and built to process large, more realistic, quantities of feed material. This report is a summary of the results obtained from the operation of the pilot plant.

A User interface architecture based on a constructivist paradigm

by C. Groeneboer and N. Cercone. Burnaby, B.C. : Simon Fraser University, Centre for Systems Science, 1991. 15 p. Bibliogr. MICROLOG 92-05400 1 fiche (Available on fiche only)

This paper presents an architecture for a multi-modal, multi-application user interface. The multi-layered system consists of a set of experts, a set of associated knowledge bases, and an interface coordinator to integrate the experts. The theoretical motivation for the design is based on a constructivist paradigm that provides a model for knowing in which knowledge is viewed as interpretive construction by an experiencing knower. A methodology emerging from and consistent with this view is then described, consisting of an hermeneutic/dialectic circle in which all those with a stake in the outcome of the inquiry are identified and their claims, concerns, and issues exposed to critique by those with different constructions. It is argued that the application of this paradigm to user interface design and evaluation is appropriate.

This manual provides information on running the MACS80 chemical speciation program that calculates the equilibrium concentration of chemical species as a function of pH in fresh water aquatic systems from the given total dissolved concentration of metals and anions either in the presence or absence of one or more of over 60 solids. It takes into account 15 anions and 14 metals commonly found in fresh waters, including the interaction of metals (Cu, Cd) with humic dissolved substances and adsorption of cadmium on suspended particulate matter. The program provides the option of performing these calculations on a closed or open system with respect to atmospheric carbon dioxide. A step-by-step description of the various input requirements and output options is given. The program can calculate results at different temperatures. The manual provides an overview of the algorithm including flow-charts and explains how results are calculated, their precision, and dependence on temperature in terms of equilibrium constants and activity coefficients. The manual also provides some guidance to programmers on how to expand the program to encompass a larger number of metals and anions.

Output includes a choice of screen display, a printable report, a standard spreadsheet file and a file formatted for input to the PBC Custom Graphics Package. Since most users will use the program through the Salmon Stock Assessment menu on the computer at the Pacific Biological Station, procedures for using the program focus on their VAX computer. When procedure differs between the VAX and micro-computer versions of the program these differences are noted. The report covers background details on the history of sales slip data and the compilation of the PBS catch database; explains the structure of the data in the database; and describes the program with various menus used to format a report.

Using density profilometer for quality and consistency measurements in MDF manufacturing

Medium density fibreboard (MDF) is a composite panel made from combinations of pulp chips, planer shavings and/or sawdust, refined to a homogeneous consistency, formed into mats, and then pressed into boards. The most common binder used is usually urea formaldehyde. Density and internal bond influence all other board characteristics, with a different density or internal bond preferred for different uses. Density profile measurement as currently conducted is very time consuming, thereby limiting the amount of data gathered for evaluation. This report presents information on the use of the density profilometer, the quality and consistency of its measurements, the factors affecting density distribution through the thickness of the board, and future applications of the technique.

Using expert systems to check compliance with municipal building codes

by E.J. Heikkila and E.J. Blewett. Ottawa : Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, 1991. 22 p. Bibliogr. MICROLOG 92-04385 1 fiche

This paper assesses the feasibility of using expert systems as a plan checking tool by developing and testing a prototype expert system based on the fire separation component of the City of Vancouver Building By-Laws. Fire separation in this context refers to the relationship between the distance of a dwelling unit from the neighbouring property and the percentage of the dwelling's exposed building face that can be devoted to windows, doors, and other unprotected openings. The report describes the Vancouver bylaws that govern fire separation and how plan checkers determine whether applications comply with these bylaws. This is followed by a general discussion of why expert systems might be thought to be an appropriate technology in this context and a description of the specific prototype expert system developed for the purpose, including an assessment by plan checking staff of its performance. The report also speculates on the potential for more widespread applications of this type.

As part of the multi-disciplinary LIMEX'89 ice and ocean dynamics experiment being undertaken off Newfoundland in March 1989, this study evaluated the electromagnetic (EM) technique for rapid collection of ice thickness data over long traverses and melting ice conditions of relatively warm, saline ice. Measurements were made using one of Aerodat's four-frequency EM systems mounted in a bird along with a laser profilometer. The bird was towed about 30m below a helicopter which flew at 50-80m elevation. EM, laser and navigation data were recorded digitally on tape in the helicopter and processed off-line. Measurements were made both over shore-fast first year ice and over first year pack ice. Simultaneous video-camera imagery was also collected and processed to estimate ice concentration and floe size at selected points. In addition, an overlay of the EM ice thickness data onto the video imagery was produced.

Ce document s'adresse aux personnes engagées dans la recherche agricole en tant que chercheurs, responsables de l'élaboration des politiques et agents de projet dans les pays en voie de développement, et vise à les aider à formuler et à concevoir une recherche agricole qui répondra de la meilleure façon possible aux besoins des agriculteurs dans ces pays. On y aborde l'application de l'analyse en fonction du sexe, l'analyse en fonction du sexe dans la planification, la conception et l'évaluation de la recherche agricole, l'analyse en fonction du sexe dans l'élaboration de plans d'action axés sur les femmes, le contrôle de l'impact, et les implications plus larges de l'analyse en fonction du sexe dans la recherche agricole.

Variable-quality form in mature jack pine stands : quantification and relationship with environmental factors

by D.M. Morris and W.H. Parker. Ottawa : National Research Council Canada, 1992. 11 p. Bibliogr. In Canadian Journal of Forest Research : vol. 22, no. 3, 1992.
MICROLOG 92-06105 1 fiche

Study to determine quantitatively to what extent various stem, crown, and branching attributes conformed to subjective evaluations of form for jack pine in northwestern Ontario and which environmental variables were associated with the form-related variation. Six fire-origin stands established on deep soils were selected on the basis of their form and subjectively evaluated as good, medium, or poor quality. Ten dominant trees were randomly chosen from each stand, and 26 attributes were determined for each sampled tree. These attributes were categorized as growth, stem form, crown form, or branch characters. Data on surrounding stand conditions and microsite were also collected. Climatic factors for each stand were interpolated from nearby weather station data. These data were analyzed by canonical discriminant analysis.

Variational approach to mutual illumination in color images

by M.S. Drew and B.V. Funt. Burnaby, B.C. : Simon Fraser University, Centre for Systems Science ; Laboratory for Computer and Communications Research, 1990. 23 p. : ill. Bibliogr.

This paper proposes a variational method for recovering the surface spectral reflectance and the spectral power distribution of the incident illumination from three-band, colour images of surfaces participating in mutual illumination. It also shows how to recover shading information and geometric information about shape and position. The variational integral makes use of finite dimensional linear models for light and surface reflectance and is based on a one-bounce model of interreflection. Tests of the method for simulations of a simple geometry were also conducted.

Cette étude a pour objet de mesurer le coût d'un 'panier' type de biens et de services dans dix villes du Canada. On y donne tout d'abord des explications détaillées quant à la nature des données sur le coût du logement, de l'habillement et d'autres articles pour lesquels Statistique Canada ne publie pas de données. Dans le chapitre 6, on décrit les méthodes utilisées pour calculer le coût des paniers respectifs des locataires et des propriétaires dans chacune des villes considérées, et on assemble les résultats afin de calculer les indices globaux interville. Les principaux résultats sont présentés dans un tableau. Finalement, le chapitre 7 est consacré à un commentaire des résultats et aux conclusions.

Comprehensive study of major field and horticultural crops grown in Ontario. It was designed to determine costs and returns of various farm enterprises, as well as the physical amounts of production inputs required. Input information was obtained through the use of recent Branch studies, plus consultation with producers, extension, research and agribusiness personnel. For each crop cost estimate, data was organized into variable and fixed costs and totalled to arrive at the cost of production on a per acre basis. Cash costs of production are also determined which include total variable costs, interest on the debt portion of investment in tractors and machines, and other overhead costs. The report includes details on the method of analysis. Vegetables are divided into the categories of those for fresh market and those for processing. Summary data are given for previous 5 years also.

While the initial impression of Cornwallis Island area is one of extreme desolation and barrenness, about 20 percent of the island does support vegetation. In August 1975, an interdisciplinary team conducted a reconnaissance terrain inventory of the areas. This report summarizes the vegetation and its relationships to the surficial materials, describes and maps the distribution of plant communities, and discusses environmental factors which control their distribution. Over 200 sites were surveyed on traverses by a Bell 206B helicopter based at the field camp on Abbott River during August 1975, and by foot and Honda ATC tricycle from Resolute Bay in mid-August 1979 and 1980. At each site individual species were inventoried and categorized for their predominant moisture regimes. Patterns of plant communities and complexes of communities were mapped on 1:60,000 scale black and white aerial photographs. Surficial materials sampling was carried out and grain size analysis, pH, carbonate content, and calcite-dolomite ratios were obtained from 183 samples. Twenty samples from Resolute Bay area were analyzed for pH, nitrogen, organic content, and cation concentrations.

The advent of the Montreal Protocol limiting, and eventually eliminating, the production of ozone-depleting chlorofluorocarbons (CFCs) has triggered an urgent need in the refrigeration and air conditioning industry for replacement alternatives. This report describes how the Vapour-Liquid Equilibrium (VLE) measurement apparatus is used to determine experimentally the interaction parameter, as defined in the Carnahan-Starling-Desantis (CSD) equation of state, for the mixtures R-22/R-152a and R-22/R-142b. It is also shown that this apparatus can be used to determine experimentally the 'a' and 'b' coefficient, as defined in the CSD equation of state, for R-22, R-142b and R-152a.

Vertical mixing rates on Georges Bank during June-July and October, 1988

by N.S. Oakey and R.G. Pettipas. Dartmouth, N.S. : Bedford Institute of Oceanography ; Dept. of Fisheries and Oceans, Scotia-Fundy Region, Physical and Chemical Sciences Branch, 1992. iv, 225 p. : ill. Bibliogr. (Canadian data report of hydrography and ocean sciences ; no. 110) ISSN 0711-6721
MICROLOG 92-05733 3 fiche

From 23 June to 17 October 1988, an extensive program of physical and biological measurements was conducted on Georges Bank. The experiment was focused around six moorings consisting of a westward array of four moorings at a spacing of about 10 km extending from number 1 in deeper water off the Bank edge where there is strong stratification to number four in the well-mixed water on the bank and two moorings to the east, consisting of number five in the stratified water off the bank and number 6 on the bank. During the field program, turbulent vertical mixing rates were estimated by using the profiler EPSONDE during the first Dawson cruise conducted from 23 June to 13 July and during a second Dawson cruise conducted from 29 September to 17 October. This report describes the data collected, including temperature fluctuations, Cox number, vertical diffusivities for temperature and density, and viscous dissipation rate. Estimates of the rate of viscous energy loss or dissipation integrated over the water column were determined and compared to the current field for each station.

According to paragraph 266(3)(a) of the National Transportation Act, 1987, the current review of transportation law must consider the effectiveness of existing policy and legislation in achieving a network of viable and effective transportation services that are responsive to the needs of shippers and travellers. This report presents information for different transportation modes on how evolving shipper and traveller needs are being met, on the changes being made in industry organization and operations to meet those needs, and on factors influencing the continuing availability of transportation services

Les Victimes de viol et la justice pénale avant le projet de loi C-127

Cette étude a pour objet, à partir de faits et de documents, d'établir et d'analyser la situation des victimes de viol dans le système de justice pénale du Canada avant l'adoption du projet de loi C-127 portant modification du Code criminel, le 3 janvier 1983. Cette étude débute par un bref aperçu des lois relatives au viol. Dans la deuxième partie, elle étudie la façon dont la police traite les plaintes de viol. Comme on le verra dans la troisième partie, le système a établi des règles et des conventions très spéciales en matière de viol et ce chapitre se penche sur cette question. On verra également la doctrine de la plainte spontanée. Les derniers chapitres sont consacrés aux déclarations de culpabilité et aux condamnations. On y présente un bref aperçu des chiffres publiés en matière de condamnation pour viol. L'étude se termine par un bref aperçu du violleur dans le pénitencier.

Videotex/Telidon at TVOntario : past and present

by J. Lavallee. Toronto : TVOntario, 1987. i, 49 p. (Working paper ; 86-9) ONTERIS: ON05794.
MICROLOG 92-06395 1 fiche

Provides a historic overview of TVOntario's videotex-teletext activities and describes the current status of the Edutex project. Involvement with videotex-teletext technology evolved through 3 stages: an experimental stage (1979-1982), a development stage (1982-1985), and a subscription service stage (1985 to present). When the experimental stage ended, the Ontario Telidon Network Project (OTNET) was formed in order to develop a fully operational videotex-teletext service. TVO's Edutex and Edutel services were created and offered to 97 schools, libraries, and youth centres across Ontario. In 1984, Edutex was extended to 11 French school sites. In 1985, the OTNET project ended and participants were obliged to pay a subscription fee and the communication costs which previously had been subsidized by government funding. Because of the high communication costs, most participants chose to discontinue the use of Edutex. It is suggested that the market size is not large enough to operate the service as a self-supporting subscription service, and that it seems unlikely that any new significant market expansion can be expected because of the high costs involved. Possibilities exist, however, for the expanded use of Edutec in other delivery forms (e.g., floppy disc, satellite developments, laser technologies).

Afin de réaliser son objectif, l'étude propose d'effectuer un bref état de la question, suivi de quatre grandes parties analytiques, portant successivement sur la réalisation de l'enquête, les caractéristiques des répondants, les caractéristiques des exportations de renseignements personnels, et les pays destinataires qui à eux seuls ont nécessité des développements assez importants pour faire l'objet d'un exposé distinct des autres résultats de l'enquête. Ces analyses comprennent des synthèses et des conclusions provisoires, elles sont suivies d'une conclusion générale proposant des synthèses par questions et par secteurs, ainsi que des considérations finales, auxquelles s'ajoutent des annexes techniques.

The BEAP3D system consists of the separate modules GENBEAP, BEAP, and VIEWBEAP. The VIEWBEAP program is the result processing module for the three-dimensional boundary element analysis program BEAP. VIEWBEAP displays mine structures or 3-D boundary element models, checks input data graphically, facilitates the handling of benchmark stress/displacement calculations, and provides graphical representations of analytical results. The Windows version of GENBEAP was developed using a MS-DOS computer along with the Microsoft Compiler C version 6.0 and Microsoft Windows development kit version 3.0. This user manual provides a general description of VIEWBEAP, its installation, the main window, the various specific windows, and a technical description of the system.

VISROCK, an elasto-visco plastic program for rocks : theoretical manual, version 1.0

by R.G. Wan. Ottawa : Canada Centre for Mineral and Energy Technology, Mining Research Laboratories, 1992. vi, 42 p. : ill. Bibliogr. (Report ; MRL 92-036(TR))
MICROLOG 92-06298 1 fiche

This report describes the theoretical background and testing of the finite element program VISROCK for the stress analysis of time dependent behaviour of mining structures. The model which is involved in this study aims at phenomenologically reproducing the main features of the creep behaviour of potash by blending the notion of viscoplastic regularization with concepts of strength degradation via cohesion and friction softening. The yield surface is based on either von Mises, Mohr-Coulomb, or Drucker-Prager criterion to characterize material strength while time dependent plastic deformations follow either a simple power law or an exponential decay. The time marching scheme hinges around an implicit algorithmic framework to avoid numerical instability and secure accuracy in computations. Numerical results are presented for a complete boundary value problem which includes the analysis of a mine in Saskatchewan for illustration purposes.

This paper examines wage and price dynamics in Canada with a view towards testing the implications of a standard model of wage-price dynamics, according to which unit labour costs are determined by a wage Phillips curve while prices are set as a markup over unit labour costs. This model is compared to an alternative model in which excess demand conditions influence prices directly, rather than indirectly through a wage Phillips curve.

In recent years, the presence in Canada of individuals who may, as Nazis or Nazi collaborators, have committed war crimes in Europe 40 to 45 years ago has raised a number of issues, including: how many such individuals currently reside in Canada, how they came to be here; whether they should be the object of investigation and prosecution; and, if so, what means might be used to bring them to justice. Since no authoritative study of these issues existed, the Deschênes Commission was appointed in 1985 to investigate and report on the subject. This paper reviews the work of this Commission.

The use of used tire rubber in hot mix asphaltic concrete offers the possibility of recycling a much higher percentage of the scrap vehicle tires generated. Experiments were conducted using about 1 percent fine tire rubber in a hot mix but the resulting product did not perform well. In 1989, a new system using up to 3 percent of tire rubber as aggregate replacement was developed and a trial was begun to study its environmental impacts, worker safety, and long term performance. This report evaluates the technical aspects of mixing and placing the asphalt rubber mix and mixing the material in an oil-fired drum mix plant; obtains exhaust stack air quality measurements for comparison with the regulatory standards and testing for compliance with worker health and safety regulations; establishes the recyclability of asphalt rubber mixtures using a drum mix plant; tests asphalt rubber mix for compliance with waste disposal regulations; evaluates the performance of the asphalt rubber mix; determines the viability of using the hot in-place surface recycling process on asphalt rubber pavements, and its compliance with environmental and worker safety regulations; and obtains estimates for the cost of the mix.

Waste-derived fuel as a supplementary energy source at the Woodstock Cement Plant

by R.W. Suderman, M.A. Nisbet and J.J. Hainsworth. Ottawa : Environment Canada, Environmental Protection Service, 1992. xv, 61 p. : ill. Bibliogr. (Report ; EPS 3/UP/6) French ed. (Le Combustible dérivé de...) : 92-04691/1. ISBN 0-662-19386-5 MICROLOG 92-04800 1 fiche

The manufacture of cement is an energy-intensive process and the burning of waste fuels to recover their energy value can provide 20-25 percent of a kiln's daily heat requirement. Lafarge Canada Inc. first considered the idea of using waste-derived fuels as a supplementary energy source in 1982. Following the successful completion of a preliminary evaluation program, the company began a project to investigate the process and both the product and environmental impact of burning liquid industrial wastes in its cement kiln at Woodstock, Ontario. All aspects of the test burn were monitored and documented for 90 days, including fuel procurement and handling, fuel combustion and emissions monitoring, emergency response, and closure of the test program. This report presents the information on the monitoring along with the economic, environmental and energy-saving implications of the waste-derived fuel project. In addition, Lafarge documented the various steps taken to keep the local public informed and to gain their acceptance. The level of success and failure in the public information program is also examined.

Water and sediment quality in Kaministiquia River delta and nearshore area of Lake Superior

by D. Boyd. Toronto : Environment Ontario, 1990. xii, 88 p. : ill. Bibliogr. ISBN 0-7729-7525-6
MICROLOG 92-00764 2 fiche

The 1987 Great Lakes Water Quality Board Report to the International Joint Commission (IJC) identified Thunder Bay as one of four Canadian areas of concern in Lake Superior, with the Kaministiquia River system as the largest single source of water-borne contaminants to the harbour and the nearshore area. Effluent from the Canadian Pacific Forest Products (CPFP) pulp and paper mill complex approximately 10 km upstream from the river mouth is the dominant point source. This report presents the results of water quality sampling for physical parameters, nutrients, trace metals, resin/fatty/aromatic acids, organochlorines, chlorobenzenes, chlorophenols, and phenoxy acids undertaken at nine stations through the study area from the top of the delta to the offshore waters of the bay on two days in late spring and two days in mid-August in 1985 and 1986. Surficial sediment sampling for physical parameters, nutrients, trace metals, and organochlorines was completed at five stations in the delta and nearshore area on one day in late spring and one day in mid-August. Suspended sediments were collected with a centrifuge (for the same analysis as surficial sediments) upstream from the CPFP complex, and downstream at the top of the delta. Whole water composite samples were also obtained from the pre-centrifuge stream at hourly intervals during each sampling period (for the same analyses as other water samples).

Water and sewer financing in Ontario : issues and options : final report

Apogee Research International, Ltd. Toronto : Environment Ontario, Fiscal Planning and Economic Analysis, 1991. 244 p. Bibliogr. MICROLOG 92-01957 3 fiche

This study examined the current state of municipal finance in Ontario for water and sewer infrastructure and identified approaches to financing water and sewers which may be applicable in the province. Questions of particular interest include whether municipalities are generally able to meet their expenditure needs, and to what extent users and beneficiaries are bearing the cost of water and sewer services. The study gives an overview of the current delivery of water and sewer services in Ontario and their financing; the benefits and costs associated with such services; innovative finance and experience in other jurisdictions; and an evaluation of financing and administrative arrangements. Specific data is given for the Town of Arnprior, the Regional Municipality of Hamilton-Wentworth, the Municipality of Metropolitan Toronto, the District Municipality of Muskoka, the Regional Municipality of Peel, and the City of Windsor.

In July 1991, a discussion paper was published in which the government reviewed its water management policies and legislation and highlighted the important issues. The public was invited to make their views known through submissions, answering a mail survey sent to 6,000 random individuals, and a series of open houses and workshops. More than 200 submissions were received by 31 December 1991. This summary was taken from transcripts of the workshops and all letters and submissions received to 15 January 1992. It groups the public's comments into protection of the aquatic environment, surface water rights, groundwater rights, water quality and quantity, water management projects and programs, water conservation and pricing, and enforcement. A summary of the public survey and of the water policy futures workshop is also included.

The Ontario Ministry of the Environment has established a Drinking Water Surveillance Program (DWSP) to provide an up-to-date database of the quality of drinking water from Ontario water treatment plants. In conjunction with DWSP, a specific plant investigation and process and operational evaluation is required for each plant involved in the program. This report presents the Odessa Water Treatment Plant raw water quality data, describes the unit treatment processes, and outlines present plant operating methodologies. The final sections of the report present an evaluation of the current particulate removal, disinfection, and taste and odour control practices and recommend modifications necessary to optimize plant performance.

Lisgar Lake was one of 11 southwestern Ontario lakes investigated as part of the Inland Lakes blue-green algae control program from 1987-89. The program was designed to monitor a selection of hardwater inland lakes with, or with the potential for, nuisance blue-green algae blooms. Lisgar Lake is a 6.8 ha hardwater lake with a maximum depth of 6.8 m, centrally located in the town of Tillsonburg. This report summarizes the water quality of Lisgar Lake during the ice-free season of 1987. Water samples and oxygen-temperature profiles were collected bi-weekly between May 11 and September 2, 1987 and zooplankton samples were also collected. Samples were analyzed for phosphorus, nitrogen, chlorophyll a, metals, conductivity, pH, alkalinity, calcium and hardness, and phytoplankton, as well as turbidity, Secchi depth and zooplankton.

The Yamaska River watershed in Quebec is intensely farmed and heavily polluted with poorly treated domestic and industrial wastes. This study investigated the responses of several components of the benthic macroinvertebrate community to municipal, industrial vs. agricultural pollution in the Yamaska River and its tributaries, as well as evaluating the performance of eight diversity and biotic indices for assessing these responses. Samples of riffle-dwelling, infaunal and colonizing invertebrates were collected from 13 sites representing a wide range of types and degrees of pollution using Surber, scoop and artificial substrate samplers during the summer of 1987. Data were summarized by number of taxa, number of individuals, Shannon-Wiener's and Simpson's index of diversity, Belgian Biotic Index, TBI, percentage of arthropods consisting of chironomids, and percentage of total organisms consisting of oligochaetes.

The study collected and analyzed a statistically valid set of bergy bit impact velocities and locations to provide the design information necessary to ice-strengthen the platform using a JONSWAP wave-energy spectrum, a SELSPOT system to record and collect impact data, and a CAD system to recreate the measured model motions and to determine the impact locations and compute the impact velocities and kinetic energy. The CAD-generated impact sequences were confirmed using video records and verification of the impact times and locations was done using output from piezoelectric sensors mounted on the platform. The radar is based on a frequency modulated interrupted continuous wave (FMICW) type waveform. The interrupt sequence, which is necessary for a high power monostatic operation, complicates the analysis of the radar performance in terms of the ambiguity function (AF). This paper analyses the range dependent AF of FMICW waveforms and proposes practical interrupt sequences for the synthesis of desired AFs. AP PR PS SC

Assessment of the feasibility of using Landsat data as a basis for wetland inventory and mapping in the Northwest Territories. Digital analysis of Landsat data on ARIES image analysis systems was used to examine land cover patterns for three wetland areas in the subarctic and boreal wetland regions. The information content of several image enhancement and classification products derived from Landsat multispectral scanner and thematic mapper data was investigated and evaluated. Study areas included the Ramparts-Lume and Brackett Lake wetland complexes, which are in the low subarctic wetland region, and the Yellowknife-Rae wetland area, which is in the continental high boreal wetland region. Wetland areas were selected for study based on their known importance to wildlife, opportunities for field work, available reference data, and interest indicated by NWT waterfowl biologists. Several digital image enhancement techniques were investigated, including contrast stretches (linear, piecewise, power) and principal components analysis.

What research says about increasing the numbers of female students taking math and science in secondary school

Summary of the research investigating ways in which female participation in mathematics and science can be encouraged. Studies have identified a number of reasons for the under-representation of females in math and science: lower parental expectations; lack of information about career options or their educational requirements; failure of educators to provide a bridge between the theoretical nature of math and important social attitudes of girls; and the perception that the 'rewards' do not justify the effort. Research has shown that programs are not effective when they rely on a 'don't do it' approach; it is important to direct intervention at young children (8-12 years old); and it is important to realize that math and science will not be appropriate choices for all females. 3 kinds of school-based interventions are discussed: 1-day conferences, which can increase students' awareness of the usefulness of math, decrease sex stereotyping slightly, stimulate career explorations, and produce changes in plans; assisting teachers in creating a gender-equitable learning environment; and modification of the curriculum to include career counselling, math anxiety clinics, tutoring, or gender-segregated classes.

Computer population models are used extensively by wildlife biologists as a management tool to predict ungulate population changes under different sport hunting regimes. These modelling exercises demonstrated a critical need for better estimates of neonatal mortality, particularly for white-tailed deer, from birth to recruitment into fall population. This report presents the results of a study to quantify and determine the causes of white-tailed deer fawn mortality, from birth to five months of age, in the Parklands of southeastern Saskatchewan. Fawn parturition chronology, birth site selection, spatial relationships, behaviour, movement patterns, and habitat preferences were also investigated to assess their impact on mortality.

A soil evaluation is required to support a development and reclamation application where arable land, potentially arable land, or pasture land is disturbed; to provide information about the soils and landforms along a proposed pipeline route; and to assist in soil conservation planning for pipeline construction. Recently there have been some concerns regarding the validity and accuracy of performing winter soil evaluations for regulated pipelines. This study outlines issues surrounding, and methods for, winter soil evaluations. Discussions were held with staff in various government departments and industry, and with consultants who are associated with or affected by such evaluations.

Wollastonite, a calcium silicate pyroxenoid used in ceramics, paints, plastics, and in asbestos replacements, occurs at several sites in B.C. as a major component of skarn bodies of contact metamorphic and metasomatic origin. Tremolite, an amphibole of similar origin and with the potential for similar uses as wollastonite, is found in similar geological environments throughout the province. This report briefly evaluates the wollastonite potential of B.C. by highlighting some of the more important occurrences. It is based on fieldwork carried out by the Geological Survey Branch and by corporations involved in the development of some of the deposits. Several tremolite deposits are also described.

Many aspects of aging pose particular challenges to women, not because of gender differences per se, but because of women's different life circumstances and positioning in society and family. Older women are more likely to be poor, in ill health, widowed, living alone, and to experience institutionalization. This paper reports findings from the 1990 General Social Survey on family and friends which reveal that many popular beliefs about women and aging are more myth than reality.

This study investigated the options for heating the houses in the new town of Peawanuck, Ontario, for the Weenusk Indian Band. A previous study on heating had identified a wood stove as the most likely heat source, but further reflection led to the conclusion that the whole house should be assessed. This report presents an assessment of a number of wood stoves, house design, and fresh air ventilation systems. The stoves selected for study were installed in the new houses and then monitored to determine the quality of heat output, wood fuel requirements, cooking and water heating capability, maintenance requirements, durability, ease of operation, and the user's acceptance of the stove. During the monitoring, the occupants and other members of the band were introduced to energy conservation measures and a longer term program for maintenance was organized.

Wood properties of subalpine fir, a British Columbia interior wood

In B.C., subalpine fir has developed a poor reputation in the wood products industry because of its low wood density, high moisture content, and high incidence of decay. Subalpine fir accounts for 22 percent of the total mature standing softwood volume in the interior of B.C. and, as logging operations move to higher elevations, will constitute an increasing proportion of the provincial timber harvest. To understand the species better, a review was carried out to compare the wood properties of subalpine fir with its principal tree species associates, lodgepole pine, Engelmann spruce, and white spruce. This review is based on a literature search and personal communications with B.C. experts working with subalpine fir, including foresters, sawmill quality control supervisors, truss fabricators, wood preservation specialists, and researchers in the pulp and paper sector. The report also considers current manufacturing uses and future potential for the wood.

Comprises an overview of the research done on the use of word processing in the elementary grades. Most of the studies showed that students wrote more and wrote better with word processors than they did with traditional tools. They improved their spelling, punctuation, organization, word choice, and ideas. Computer use also had a positive effect on the writing of children with special needs (e.g., English as a second language) and with learning disabilities. While further study is needed to confirm this, it appears that there is a transfer of the skills acquired through word processing to writing with traditional tools.

Primary-age students seem to adapt more readily to the computer than do older elementary school students. Research also seems to indicate a relationship between reading and writing skills.

Halifax : The Board, 1991. 40 p. : ill. CSI 52131.001
MICROLOG 92-01980 1 fiche

The Board is responsible for providing workers' compensation coverage to Nova Scotia employers and collection of assessment revenue. It classifies industries, determines rates and adjudicates claims resulting from work-related accidents, making decisions concerning the payment of claims as a result of reports from workers, employers, doctors and hospitals. It assists in the rehabilitation of workers returning to the work force, as well as the permanently disabled. To assist in claims processing the Board's Medical Department performs physical examinations and acts as medical advisor in the claims adjudication. This annual reports on wage loss, assessment options, and unfunded liability. Financial statements, notes to them, financial schedules are included. A statistical summary presents rate groups, nature of injury, injury by part of body, source of injury, accident type, with summary data on claims, age of client, pensions, and claims by county. A glossary of terms is included.

This document discusses the consequences of low literacy skills for participants and for employability projects. It offers a way to assess whether individuals' literacy skills are sufficient to let them feel comfortable in programs. It highlights ways in which literacy training is already provided in life and work skills programs. It also discusses the benefits and drawbacks of computer-assisted training and explains how to bring formal literacy training into a program. Finally it provides information on getting financial and other resources needed to offer literacy training in a program.

This report begins with an overview of smoking behaviour in Canada. This is followed by a summary of legislation affecting smoking in Canadian public places and workplaces, and a review of research on reactions to 'no smoking' policies. The core of the report is a detailed analysis of data collected in the 1990 Alberta Survey, a random sample public opinion survey of 1245 adult residents of the province. It examines the smoking behaviour of different sub-groups in the Alberta population and the existence of workplace smoking policies. It also analyses how Albertans react to such violations of smoking restrictions and considers differences across population sub-groups.

The Great Lakes Health Effects Cohort Study is a multi-phase project to investigate the relationships between human exposure to contaminants found in the Great Lakes Basin through consumption of contaminated fish and wildlife and the risk of a variety of adverse health effects. Phase III of the study uses exposure assessment and epidemiologic studies to identify high-risk populations and to examine the relationship between exposure and specific health effects. This document gives an overview of the program and the cohort study; the objectives of the workshop; reports from each of the four discussion groups on exposure assessment, reproductive outcomes, childhood development, and immunological effects; and changes to the design of Phase II, which is an anglers survey used to identify those consuming large quantities of fish and wildlife through a brief questionnaire mailed to a stratified random sample of Ontario residents.

This report documents the growth of some of the oldest plantations in the province. The data given are meant as an illustration of the yields realizable from forest plantations. Twenty of the oldest, well stocked plantations of different species were selected. A circular sample plot, each containing a minimum of 35 trees, was located in a well-stocked portion of each plantation surrounded by a buffer zone of similar stocking and equal in width to the average tree height. All trees more than one centimetre in diameter at breast height were measured and 15 trees, representing the range of diameters but weighted towards the larger, were selected and measured for height. An estimate of the capability was determined by measuring breast height age and height of the five tallest trees. Site evaluation included a description of the lesser vegetation, soil texture, moisture, depth, parent material, rock type, relief, topography, slope, and aspect.

While the service sector has become a significant employer for all types of Canadians, it is a particularly dominant source of jobs for young people. Despite the importance of this trend, little is known about the quality of service jobs that Canada's new generation of workers are getting. This paper addresses that issue by examining the transition from school to work in a service economy. Using panel data covering a 24-month period, the authors track the experiences of a sample of high-school and university graduates in three Canadian cities following their graduation. They document the patterns of transition out of the education system and into the labour market, the occupations and industries where the recent graduates found work, and the quality of those jobs in terms of content, rewards, and job satisfaction.

Zebra mussel chlorination benthic survey, 1990

by R.W. Sheehan. Toronto : Ontario Hydro, Research Division, 1991. vi, 69 p. : ill. Bibliogr. (Report : no. 91-81-K)
MICROLOG 92-00890 1 fiche

Zebra mussels continue to disperse and increase in abundance within the Great Lakes, resulting in greater entrainment of and colonization by the veligers at Ontario Hydro generating facilities. To control the mussels, the station service water systems were chemically treated with chlorine (sodium hypochlorite, NaOCl), approved by the Ontario Ministry of the Environment in 1990 with the condition that benthic surveys were conducted at the affected generating facilities to determine whether or not the chlorine residues affected the communities in the discharge plume. Benthic organisms were collected at similar reference and discharge sampling sites at Darlington Nuclear Generating Station, Lakeview Thermal Generating Station, Lambton Thermal Generating Station, and Nanticoke Thermal Generating Station prior to (May) and after (December) chlorination. Divers collected the samples at three reference and three discharge sites which had similar depth and substrate components whenever possible.

Zooplankton dynamics and walleye Stizostedion vitreum production in culture ponds at Methley Beach, Dauphin Lake, Manitoba, 1985-89

by T.A. Johnston...et al. Winnipeg : Dept. of Fisheries and Oceans, Central and Arctic Region, 1992. vi, 34 p. : ill. Bibliogr. (Canadian technical report of fisheries and aquatic sciences ; no. 1841) This is the 42nd technical report from the Central and Arctic Region, Winnipeg. ISSN 0706-6457
MICROLOG 92-05855 1 fiche

A cooperative fisheries rehabilitation research program was begun in 1982 to develop methods for the enhancement and rehabilitation of freshwater fisheries. One objective of the program was to examine the impacts of prolarval (fry) and juvenile (fingerling) walleye introductions on the walleye population of Dauphin Lake, Manitoba. This study examined how conditions during the early stages of walleye feeding influence juvenile production, particularly the relationships between the numbers, size, and biomass of juveniles harvested and the zooplankton abundance and walleye growth during the postlarval period. The effects of fertilization on the environment and the zooplankton communities, especially during the postlarval period, were also assessed.
